THE HISTORY

OF

ENGLA

VOL. VI.

1

HISTORY

OF,

ENGLAND,

FROM THE

INVASION OF JULIUS CÆSAR TO

The REVOLUTION in 1688.

In EIGHT VOLUMES, illustrated with Plates.

By DAVID, HUME, Eiq.

A NEW EDITION, with the Author's last Corrections and Improvements.

To which is prefixed,
A short ACCOUNT of his LIFE, written by Himself.

VOL. VI.

LONDON:

Pinted for T. CADF_L:

And fold by T. CADELL jun. and W. DAVILS, (Successors to Mr. CADELL,) in the Strand, and T. N. LONGMAN, Paternoster-Row.

MDCCXCVII.

CONTENTS

OF THE

SIXTH VOLUME.

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

JAMES 1.

CHAP. XLV.

Introduction—James's first transactions—State of Europe—Rosni's negotiations—Raleigh's conspiracy—Hampton-court conference—A parliament—Peace with Spain.—Page 1

CHAP. XLVI.

Gunpowder comparacy—A parliament—Truce betwixt Spain and the United Provinces—A parliament —Death of the French king—Arminianif——— State of Ireland.

CHAP. XLVII.

Death of prince Henry—Inarriage of the princess Elizabeth with the Palatine—Rise of Sometset—His marriage

CONTENTS.

marriage— Overbury poisoned—Fall of Somesset

— Rise of Buckingham—Cautionary towns delivered

- Affairs of Scotland.

Page 62

CHAP. ELVIII.

Sir Walter Raleigh's expedition—His execution—Infurrection in Bolemus—I.ofs of the Palatinate—Negotiations with Spain—A parliament—Parties —Fall of Bacon—Rupeire between the king and the commons—Protellation of the commons—93

CHAP. XLIX.

A'PPENDIX

TO THE

REIGNOF JAMES 1.

CONTEN

CHAPLES I.

CHAP. L.

A parliament of Westminster——At Oxford——Naval expedition against Spain——Second parliament——Impeachment of Buckingham——Violent measures of the court——War with France——Expedition to the isle of Rhe.

Page 199

CHAP. I.I.

Third parliament—Petition of right—Prorogation——Death of Buckingham—New fession of parliament—Townsge and poundage—Arminianism——Diffolution of the parliament.

238

CHAP. LII.

CHAP, LIII.

Discontents in Scotland — Introduction of the canons and liturgy — A tumult at Edinburgh — The covenant — A general assembly — Episcopacy abolished — War — A pacification — Renewal of the war — Fourth English parliament — Dissolution — Discontents in England — Rout at Newburn — Treaty at Rippon — Great council of the peers. — 319

CHAP.

CONTENTS.

CHAP. LIV.

Meeting of the long parliament—Strafford and Laud impeached—Finch and Windebank fly—Gre t authority of the commons—The bishops attacked—Tonnage and poundage—Triennial bill—Strafford's trial—Bill of attainder—Execution of Strafford—High-commission and star-chamber abolished—King's journey to Scotland.

Laud Meeting of the long parliament—Strafford and Laud Tonnage attacked—Triennial bill—Strafford's trial—Bill of attainder—Execution of Strafford—High-commission and star-chamber abolished—

King's journey to Scotland.

CHAP. LV.

Settlement of Scotland—Conspiracy in Ireland—Infurrection and massacre—Meeting of the English parliament—The remonstrance—Reasons on both sides—impeachment of the bishops—Accusation of the five members—Tumults—King leaves London—Arrives in York—Preparations for civil war. 425

CHAP. LVI.

Commencement of the civil war—State of parties—Battle of Edgehill—Negotiation at Oxford—Victories of the royalists in the west—Battle of Stratton—Of Landdown—Of Roundway-down—Death of Hambden—Bristol taken—Siege of Glocester—Battle of Newbury—Ack ... in the north of England—Solemn league and covenant—Arming of the Sects—State of Ireland.

HISTORY

0

GREAT BRITAIN.

AMESI.

CHAP. XLV.

Introduction Junes's first transactions State of Europ -- Rojni's negotiations -- Rakigli's con-Theracy-Itamplen a art conference-A parliamont - Peacy gritte Spain.

HE crown of England was never translainted CHAP. A from father to lon with greater tranquillity than it passed from the family of Tudor to that of Stuart. During the whole reign of Elizabeth, the eves of men had been employed in learch of the fuecoffor; and when old age made the mospect of her death more immediate, there appear, mone but me king of Scots, who could advance a y just claim or pretention to the throne. He was great-grandion Vol. VI.

XIV.

16 13.

CHAP. of Margaret, elder daughter of Henry VII.; and, on the failure of the male-line, his hereditary right remained unquestionable. If the religion of Mary queensof Scots, and the other prejudices contracted against her, had formed any considerable obttable to her succession; these objections, being entirely perfonal, had no place with regard to her fon. "Men also confidered, that though the title, derived from blood, had been frequently violated fince the Norman conquest, such licences had proceeded more from force or intrigue, than from any deliberate maxims of government. The lineal heir had still in the end prevailed; and both his exclusion and restoration had been commonly attended with such convultions as were folicient to warn all prudent men not lightly to give way to fuch irregularities. If the will of Henry VIII, authorifed by act of parliament, had tacitly excluded the Scottilli line, the tyranny and caprices of that monarch had been for figual, that a lettlement of this nature, unsupported by any just reason, had no authority with the people. Queen Elizabeth too, with her dying breath, had recognized the undoubted title of her kinfman James; and the whole nation feemed to dispose themselves with joy and pleasure for his reception. Though born and educated amidst a foreign and hostile people, men hoped, from his character of moderation and wisdom, that he would embrace the maxims of an English monarch; and the prudenz forelaw greater advantages refulting from a union with Scotland, than difadvantages from fubmitting to a prince of that nation. The alacrity with which the English looked toward the successor had appeared fo evident to Vizabeth, that, concurring with other causes, it affected her with the deepelt melancholy; and that wife princess, whose pene-tration and experience had given her the greatest infight into human affairs, had not yet fusficiently weighed weighed the ingratitude of courtiers and levity of CHAP. XLV.

1603.

the people.

As victory abroad, and tranquillity at home, had attended this princels, the left the nation in such flourishing circumstances, that her successor possessed every advantage, except that of comparison with her illustrious name, when he mounted the throne of England. The king's journey from Edinburgh to First trans. London immediately afforded to the inquisitive actions of fome circumstances of comparison, which even the natural partiality in favour of their new fovereign could not interpret to his advantage. As he paffed along, all ranks of men flocked about him from every quarter, allured by interest or curiosity. Great were the rejoicings, and loud and hearty the acclamations which resounded from all fides; and every one could remember how the affability and popular manners of their queen displayed themselves amidst luch concourse and exultation of her subjects. But James, though fociable and familiar with his friends and countiers, hated the buille of a mixed multitude; and though far from disliking slattery, yet was he still fonder of tranquillity and ease. He isflued therefore a proclamation, forbidding this refort of people, on pretence of the fearcity of provisions, and other inconveniencies, which, he faid, would necessarily attend it '.

HE was not, however, infensible, to the great flow of affection which appeared in his new fubjects; and being himself of an assectionate temper, he scens to have been in halte to make them some return of kindness and good offices. .. To this motive, probably, we are to ascribe that profusion of titles which was observed in the beginning of his-reign; when, in fix weeks time after his entrance into the kingdom, he is computed to have best wed knight-

Kenligt, p. 662-

hood on no less, than two hundred and thirty-seven persons. If Elizabeth's frugality of honours, as well as of money, had sormerly been repined at, it began now to be valued and essented; and every one was sensible that the king, by his lavish and premature conserring of favours, had tailed of obliging the persons on whom he bestowed them. Titles of all kinds became so common, that they were searcely marks of distinction; and being distributed, without choice or deliberation, to persons unknown to the prince, were regarded more as the proofs of

A PASQUIN ADE was affixed to St. Paul', in which an art was promited to be taught, very necessary to assist manner of the facility and good-nature, than of any determined new nobility 1.

friendthip or eileem.

Wil may prefume, that the English would have thrown less blame on the Ling's facility in belowing favores, had these been confined desirely to their own nation, and had not been flored out, in too nacqual preportions, to bis old dubjects. James, who, through his whole ici, n, was more guided by temper and inclination then by the rules of political prudence, had brought with him great numbers of his Scottish convices; whele impatience and importunity were apt, in many particulars, to impose on the easy not read their mafter, and extort favours, of which, it is not mad to imagine, his English subice's would build complain. The debe of Lenox, the carl of Eleme, load Hume, load Kinlo's, fir George Linner, Recrease Elphindenes, were imnegliately acted to the English privy council. Sir George Louve, when he created earl of Dunbar, was bis a conted to contine on long as that nobleman field, and was one of the whelt and most virtuous,

Willon, in Mennet, p. 655.

c Ibid. p. 662.

さんり

though the least powerful, of all thole whom the CHAP. king ever honoured with that diffinction. Hay, all violations after, was created viscount Doncaster, then earl of Carlisle, and got an immense fortune from the crown; all which he spent in a splendid and courtly manner. Ramsay obtained the title of earl of Holderness; and many others, being raised on a sudden to the highest elevation, increased, by their insolence, that envy which naturally attended them, as strangers and ancient enemies.

In must however be owned, in justice to James, that he left almost all the chief offices in the hands of Elizabeth's ministers, and trusted the conduct of political concerns, both foreign and domestic, to his English subjects. Among these, secretary Cecil, created fuccessively lord Esfindon, viscount Cranborne, and earl of Salitbury, was always regarded as his prime minister and thief countellor. Though the capacity and penetration of this minister were fufficiently known, his favour with the king created surprise on the accession of that monarch. The fecret correspondence into which he had entered with James, and which had fenfibly contributed to the easy reception of that prince in England, laid the foundation of Cecil's credit; and while all his former affociates, fir Walter Raleigh, lord Grey, lord Cobham, were discountenanced on account of their animofity against Essex, as well as for other reasons, this minister was continued in employment, and treated with the greatest considence and regard.

THE capacity of James and his ministers in negotiation was immediately put to trial, on the appearance of ambassadors from almost all the princes and states of Europe, in order to congratulate him on his accession, and to form with him new treaties and alliances. Besides ministers from Venice, Denmark, the Palatinate, Henry Frederic of Nasiau,

B 3 affifted

XLV.

1603.

CHAP, affifted by Barnevelt the penfionary of Holland, was ambaffador from the flates of the United Provinces. Aremberg was tent by archduke Albert; and Taxis was expected in a little time from Spain. But he who most excited the attention of the public, both on account of his own merit and that of his mafter, was the sagree's of Rofni, afterwards duke of Sally, prime minister and favourise of Henry IV. of France.

State of Europe.

While the deminions of the house of Austria devolved on Philip II. all Pictope was think with terror left the perfer of a family, which had been raifed by fortune, should now be carried to an immeasurable height by the wildom and conduct of this monarch. But never were apprehensions found in the event to be more groundlet. Slow without prudence, ambitious without enterpri , L1 is without deceiving any body, and refuged without any true judgment; fuch was the charecter or Philip and fuch the character which, during his lifetime, and after his death, be impressed on the Spanish councils. Revolted or depopulated provinces, discontented or indolent inhabitants, were the spectacles which those dominions, lying in every climate of the globe, 'pretented to Philip III. a weak prince, and to the duke of Lerma, a minister weak and odious. But though military discipline, which still remained, was what alone gave some appearance of life and vigour to that Enguishing body, yet so great was the terror produced by former power and ambition, that the reduction of the house of Antitria was the object of men's vows throughout all the states of Christendom. not perceived, that the Trench empire, now united in domettic peace, and governed by the most heroic and most amiable prince that adoms no tern stery, was become, of ittell, a fafficient counterpoise to the Spanish greatness. Perhaps, that prince himfelt 15

1603.

felf did not perceive it, when he proposed, by his CHAP. minister, a league with James, in conjunction with Venice, the United Provinces, and the northern crowns; in order to attack the Austrian dominious Rosm's on every fide, and depress the exorbitant power of that ambitious family'. . But the genius of the English monarch was not equal to fuch vast enterprites. The love of peace was his ruling passion; and it was his peculiar felicity, that the conjunctures of the times rendered the same object which was agreeable to him in the highest degree advantageous to his people.

Title French ambaffador, therefore, was obliged to depart from these extentive views, and to concert with James the means of providing for the fafety of the United Provinces: Nor was this object altogether without its difficulties. The king, before his accession, had entertained scruples with regard to the revolt of the Lew Countries; and being commonly open and fincere', he had, on many occasions, gone so far as to give to the Dutch the appellation of rebels*: But having conversed more. fully with English ministers and courtiers, he found their attachment to that republic fo strong, and their opinion of common interest so established, that he was obliged to facrifice to politics his fenfe, of juftice; a quality which, even when erroneous, is respectable as well as rare in a monarch. He therefore agreed with Rohii to support secretly the statesgeneral, in concert with the king of France; left their weakness and despair should oblige them to submit to their old master. The articles of the treaty were few and fimple. It was stipulated, that the two kings should allow the Dutch to levy forces in their respective dominions; and should ^{*} Sully's Memoirs. La Boderie, vol. i. p. 120. Winwood, val. n. p. 3.

CHAP, underhand remit to that republic the sum of one million four hundred thousand livres a year for the pay of these forces: That the whole sum should be advanced by the king of France; but that the third of it should be deducted from the debt due by him to queen Elizabeth. And if the Spaniard attacked either of the princes, they agreed to affift each office; Henry with a force of ten thousand men, James with that of fix. This treaty, one of the witch and most equitable concluded by James during the course of his reign, was more the work of the prince himself, than any of his ministers.

Raleigh's conipiracy.

Amidst the great tranquillay, both foreign and domestic, with which the nation was blest, nothing could be more furprifing than the discovery of a conspiracy to subvert the government, and to fix on the throne Arabella Stuart, a near relation of the king's by the family of Lenox, and defcended equally from Henry VII. Every thing remains still mysterious in this conspiracy, and history can give us no clue to unravel it. Watton and Clarke, ewo catholic priests, were accused of the plot: Lord Grey, a purisan: Lord Cobham, a'thoughtless man, of no fixed principle: And fir Walter Raleigh, fufpected to be of that philosophical feel, who were then extremely rare in England, and who have fince received the appellation of free-thickers: Together with these Mr. Broke, brother to lord Cobham, sir Griffin Markham, Mr. Copeley, sir Ed. What cement could enite men of ward Pathani. fuch discordant principles in so dangerous a combination; what end they proposed, or what means proportioned to an undertaking of this nature, has never yet been explained, and cannot easily be imagined. As Raleigh, Grey, and Cobham were commonly believed, after the quetin's death, to have opposed proclaiming the king, till conditions should be made with him; CHAP. they were upon that account extremely obnoxious to the court and ministry; and people were apt, at first, " to suspect, that the plot was merely'a contrivance of fecretary Cecil, to get rid of his old confederates, now become his most inveterate enemies. But the confesion, as well as trial of the criminals, put the matter beyond doubt i. And though no one could find any marks of a concerted enterprise, it appeared that men of furious and ambitious spirits, meeting frequently together, and believing all the world discontented like themselves, had entertained very criminal projects, and had even entered, some of them at least, into a correspondence with Aremberg, the Flemish ambassador, in order to give diffurbance to the new fettlement.

XLV.

THE two priefts and Broke were executed: Cobliam, Grey, and Markham were pardoned ", after they had laid their heads upon the block. Raleigh too was reprieved, not pardoned; and he contined in confinement many years afterwards.

IT appears from Sully's Memoirs, that Raleigh fecretly offered his fervices to the French ambaffador; and we may thence prefume, that meeting with a repulse from that quarter, he had recourse, for the fame unwarrantable purposes, to the Flemish minister. Such a conjecture we are now enabled to form; but it must be confessed, that, on his trial, there appeared no proof of this transaction, nor indeed any circumstance which could justify his condemination. He was accused by Cobham alone, in a sudden sit of passion, upon hearing that, Raleigh, when examined, had pointed out fome circumstances, by which Cobham's guilt might be known and accr-

State Trids, p. 180, 2d edit. Winwood, wl. in p. 8. 11.
1 December 5. " December 9. * Winwood, vol. ii. p. 11.

1603.

Cu AP. tained. This acculation Cobham afterwards retracted; and foon after he retracted his retractation. Yet upon the written evidence of this fingle witness, a man of us honour or understanding, and to contradictory in his tellimony; no commonted with Raleigh; not supported by any c nearning direumstance; was that great man, contrary to all lew and equire, found guilty by the jury. This rame was at that the extremely ealbar in England; and every man was pleated to give reater or against the capital enemy of Effect, the arrasite of the people.

Sir Edward Coac, the Jamous lawyer, then artorney general, manifed the cause for the crown, and threw out on Paleigh tuch probability, as may be deemed a great reflection, not only on his own memory, but even, in force degree, on the mannor of the ope. Traitor, monfler, viper, and finitize of last, are the terms which he employs against one of the most illustrious men of the kingdom, who was under trial for life and fortune, and who defended hinnelf with temper, eloquence, and conrage '.

1604.

The next occupation of the king was entirely according to his heart's content. He was employed in dictating magisterially to an assembly of divines concerning points of faith and discipline, and in receiving the applaules of these holy men for his fuperior zeal and learning. The religious disputes between the church and the puritans had induced him to call a conference at Hampton-court, on pretence of finding expedients which might reconcile both parties.

Though the feverities of Elizabeth towards the catholics had much weakened that party, whose genius was opposite to the prevailing spirit of the nation; like feverities had had fo little influence on CHAP. the puritans, who were encouraged by that spirit, ALV. that no less than seven hundred and fifty clergymen of that party figured a petition to the king on his accession; and many more seemed willing to adhere to it. They all hoped that James, having received his education in Scotland, and having fometimes professed an attachment to the church established there, would at least abate the rigour of the laws enacted in tupport of the ceremonies, and against peritans; if he did not flow more particular grace and encouragement to that feel. But the king's disposition had taken strongly a contrary bias. The more he knew the puritarical clargy, the less favour he bere to them. He had remarked in their Scottish be thren a violent turn towards republicanilm, and a zealous attachment to civil liberty; principles nearly allied to that religious enthutadm with which they were actuated. He had found, that being modly persons of low birth and mean education, the "home lody protendious which attended them in their In Figuraddrelles to their Maker, of whom they beit wed th infelies the peculiar favourites; induced to in to me, the utmost fre doms, with their estribly fovereign. In both capacities, of monarch and of theologian; he had experienced the little complaifance which they were disposed to shew him; whilst they controlled his commands, disputed his teners, and, to his face, before the whole people, centured his conduct and believiour. If he had submitted to the indignity of courting their favour, he treatured up, on that account, the stronger reseatment against them, and was determined to make them feel, in their turn, the weight of his suthority. Though he had often met with relistance and taction and oblis-, nacy in the Scottish nobility, he retained no ill-will to that order; or rather shewed them savour and kindness in England, beyond what reason and sound policy could well justify: But the ascendant which the presbyterian clergy had assumed over him was what his monarchical pride could never the loughly digest.

D State Trials, 1st ed t. p. 176. 177. 182.

F Fuller, book 10. Collier, vol. ii. p. 672.

C H A P MLV.

He dreaded likewise the popularity which attended this order of men in both kingdonis. As ufcless autherities and felt-denial are imagined, in many religious, to render us acceptable to a benevolent Being, who created us folely for happiness, James remarked that the ruffic severity of these clergymen, and of their whole teet, had given them, in the eyes of the multitude, the appearance of fanctity and virtue. Stroughy inclined himself to mirth and wine and sports of all kinds, he apprehended their centure for his manner of life, free and disengaged: And, being thus averle, from temper, as well as policy, to the sect of puritans, he was resolved, it possible, to prevent its farther growth in England.

But it was the character of James's councile, throughout his whole reign, that they were more wife and equitable in their end, than prudent and political in the means. Though juffly tenfible that no part of civil administration required greater care or a nicer judgment than the conduct of religious parties; he had not perceived; that, in the fame proportion as this practical knowledge of theology is requisite, the speculative resinements in it are mean and even dangerous in a monarch. By entering zealously into srivolous disputes, James gave them an vir of importance and dignity which they could not otherwise have acquired; and being shingly enlisted in the quarrel, he could no longer have

In es very ned to lay, in his Baldicon Doron, published while he was in Scotland. "I protest before the great God, and the I am here as upon my l'estament, it is no place for me to he in, that ye shell never find with any Highland or Borderer. I hieves greater ingratitude and more his and vite peripries, than with there families to private. And suffer not the principal of them to brook your land." K. James's Worse, p. 161.

have recourse to contempt and ridicule; the only CHAP. proper method of appearing it. The church of XLV. England had not yet abandoned the rigid doctrines of grace and predeffination: The puritans had not yet faparated themselves from the church, nor openly renounced epifcopacy. Though the spirit of the parties was confiderably different, the only appearing subjects of dispute were concerning the cross in baptism, the ring in marriage, the use of the furplice, and the bowing at the name of Jesus. Thefe were the mighty questions which were fo- Conferlenuly agitated in the conference at Hampton-ence at Hamptoncourt between some bishops and dignitied clergymen court. on the one hand, and fome leaders of the puritanical party on the other; the king and his ministers being

pretent

Till puritans were here so unreasonable as to 4th Jan. complain of a partial and unfair management of the difpute; as if the fearch after truth were in any degree the object of fuch conferences, and a candid 'indifference, fo rare even among private inquirers in philosophical qualions, could ever be expected among princes and prelates, in a theological controverfy. The king, it must be confessed, from the beginning of the conference, showed the strongest propensity to the established church, and frequently inculcated a maxim, which, though it has some foundation, is to be received with great limitations, No Bishop, No Kine. The hishops, in their turn, were very liberal of their praises towards the royal disputant; and the archbithop of Canterbury said, that undoubtedly his majefly spake by the special af-Mance of God's Spirit. A tew alterations in the liturgy were agreed 10, and both parties separated with mutual diffatisfaction.

Or had frequently been the practice of the puthans to form certain affemblies, which they called Fuller's Feelestaft. Milling. . . . Kenner, p. 655.

YrA. 1604.

CHAP. prophefyings; where alternately, as moved by the fpirit, they displayed their zoal and prayers and exhortations, and raifed their own enthuliafin, as well as that of their audience, to the highest pitch, from that focial contagion which has fo mighty an influence on holy fervours, and from the mutual emulation which arose in those trials of religious eloquence. Such dangerous focieties had been supprefled by Elizabeth; and the ministers in this conference moved the king for their revival. James sharply replied, If you aim at a Scottish presbytery, it agrees as well with monarchy as God and the devil. There Jack and Iom and Will and Dick shall meet and confure me and my council. Therefore I reiterate my for mer speech: Le Roi s'avisera. I pray, for one feven years before you domand; and then, if you find me grow purfic and fat, I may perchance bearken unto you. For that government will keep me in breath, and give me work enough. Such were the political confiderations which determined the king in his choice among religious parties.

A parliament.

THE next affembly in which James displayed his learning and eloquence, was one that showed more spirit of liberty than appeared among his March 19. bishops and theologians. The parliament was now ready to affemble; being so long delayed on account of the plague, which had broken out in London, and raged to fuch a degree that above 30,000 persons are computed to have died of it in a year; though the city contained at that time little more than 150,000 inhabitants.

THE speech which the king made on opening the parliament, fully displays his character, and proves hime to have possessed more knowledge and better parts, than prudence or any juil fense of decorum and propriety". Though few productions of the age furpals this performance either in style or CHAP. matter; it wants that majestic brevity and referve XLV. which becomes, a king in his addresses to the great council of the nation. It contains, however, a remarkable stroke of candour, where he confesses his too great facility in yielding to the folicitations of fuitors : A fault which he promises to correct, but which adhered to him, and distressed him, during the whole course of his reign.

Fuller's Ecclesiast. History. " K. James's Works, p. 484, 485. &c. Journ. 22d March, 1603. Kennet, p. 668.

1604.

Tire fift business, in which the commons were engaged, was of the almost importance to the prefervation of their privileges; and neither temper nor resolution were wanting in their conduct of it.

In former periods of the English government, the house of commons was of to finall weight in the balance of the conflitution, that lit. Is attention had been given, either by the crown, the people, or the house ittelf, to the choice and continuance of the It had been woul, after parliaments were prolonged beyond one fellion, for the chancellor to exert a diferetionary authority of bloing new writs to apply the place of any members whom he judged incapable of attending, either on account of their employment, their neithers, or other impediment. This practice gave that minister, and confequently the prince, an unlimited power of modelling at pleafure the representatives of the nation; yet fo little jealouty had it created, that the commons, of themlelves, without any court influence or intrigue, and contrary to some former votes of their own, confirmed it in the twenty-third of Elizabeth . At that time, though fome members, whose places had been supplied on account of fieltness, having now recovered their health, appeared in the house, and claimed their feat; fuch was the authority of the chancellor, that, merely out of respect to him, ^{*} K. James's Works, p. 495. 499. Y Joarn. January 19, 1580.

λi.V.

CHAP. his fentence was adhered to, and the new members were continued in their places. Here a most dangerous prerogative was conferred on the crown: But to show the genius of that age, or rather the channels in which power then ran, the crown put very little value one this authority; infomuc i that two days afterwards the chancellor, of himself, refigned it back to the commons, and gave them power to judge of a particular vacancy in their house. And when the question concerning the chancellor's new writs was again brought on the carpet towards the end of the fellion, the commons were fo little alarmed at the precedent, that, though they readmitted some old members, whose seats had been vacated on account of flight indispositions, yet they confirmed the chancellor's fentence, in instances where the distemper appeared to have been dangerous and incurable". Nor did they proceed any farther in viadication of their privileges, than to vote, that during the fitting of parliament there do not, at any time, any were go out for chaling or returning any member without the warrant of the house. Elizabeth's reign we may remark, and the reigns preceding, fessions of parliament were not usually the twelfth part to long as the vacations; and during the latter, the chancellor's power, if he pleafed to exert it, was confirmed, at least left; by this vote, as unlimited and unrefludined as ever.

> In a subsequent parliament, the absolute authority of the queen was exerted in a manner still more open; and began for the first time to give alarm to the commons. New writs having been issued by the chancellor when there was no vacancy, and a controversy arising upon that incident, the queen fent a message to the house, informing them, that it were impertinent for them to deal in such matters. These questions, she said, belonged only to the chancellor; and she had appointed him CHAP. to conser with the judges, in order to settle all dif- XLV. putes with regard to elections. The commons had the courage, a few days after, to vote, "That it " was a most perilous precedent, where two knights " of a country were duly elected, if any new writ " fliobld iffue out for a fecond election, without " order of the house itself; that the discussing and " adjudging of this and fuch like differences be-" longed only to the house; and that there should be no message sent to the lord chancellor, not so " much as to inquire what he had done in the " matter, because it was conceived to be a matter " derogatory to the power and privilege of the " house "." This is the most considerable, and almost only, instance of parliamentary liberty, which occurs during the reign of that princefs.

^{*} Journ. March 18, 1520. See farther D'Ewes, p. 430.

OUTLAWS, whether on account of debts or crimes, had been declared by the judges bincapable of enjoying a feat in the house, where they must themetelves be lawgivers; but this opinion of the judges had been frequently over-ruled. I find, however, in the case of Vaughan', who was questioned for an outlawry, that, having proved all his debts to have been contracted by suretiship, and to have been, most of them, honestly compounded, he was allowed, on account of these favourable circumstances, to keep his seat: Which plainly supposes that, otherwise, it would have been vacated, on account of the outlawry.

WHEN

D'Ewes, p. 397.

d In a subsequent parliament, that of the 35th of the queen the commons, after given debate, expressly voted, that a person cuttawed might be elected. D'Ewes, p. 318. I'ut as the matter had been much contested, the king might think the vote of the house no law, and maght exteem his own decision of more weight than theirs. We may also suppose that he was not acquimmed with this vote. Queen Elizabeth, in her speech to her last parliament, complained of the Vol. VI.

XIV. 1604.

CHAP. WHEN James summoned this parliament, he iffued a proclamation'; in which, among many general advices, which, like a kind tutor, he bestowed on his people, he strictly enjoins them not to choose any outlaw for their representative: And he adds; If any person take upon him the place of knight, citizen, or burgefe, not being duly el éled, according to the laws and flatutes in that behalf provided, and according to the purport, effect, and true meaning of this our proclamation, then every person for offending to be find or in prefenced for the fame. A proclamation here was plantly jut on the fame footing with a law, and that in to delicate a point as the right of elections: M. R. darning circumstances, had there not been recon to believe that this measure, being entered into ally in the king's reign, proceeded more from programion and mittake, than from any ferious defign of invading the privileges of parliament 1.

> Sir Francis Goody in was chosen member for the county of Paulis; and his return, as ufual, was · made into chancery. The chancellor, pronouncing him an outlaw, vacated his teat, and iffued write for a new election . She John Forteigue was chosen it. his place by the county. But the first act of the hou'e, was to reverse the chancellor's femience, and restore fir Francis to his leat. At the king's sug-

their ad aitting outlews, and repretents that conduct of the house as ឧស្សាសា សាសាសាស

C. Jun. 1-, 1604. But in in mari, p. 561.

f the dake of a lack us, the rewise maxim of James; that no concern the hip year of the eight for old begin any confiderable undert len . A . A to a mark of a nicht, and very fuitable to his cautions, not to be time of racter. The facility with which he depasseos from the protection, in a other profithat his meaning was introgent. The half the privileges of purh ment been at that time exabily former dy or we also wer tury ten ted, could fuch an imagination con have beneviousness by him, as to think that his proclamations could regulate parliamentally clections?

gestion, the lords desired a conference on the subject; CHAP. but were absolutely resuled by the commons, as the XLV. question entirely regarded their own privileges h. The commons, however, agreed to make a remonstrance to the king by the mouth of their speaker; in which they maintained, that though the returns were by form made into chancery, yet the fole right. of judging with regard to elections belonged to the house itself, not to the chancellor. James was not fatisfied, and ordered a conference between the house and the judges, whose opinion in this case was opposite to that of the commons. This conference, he faid, he commanded as an obfolute king k; an epithet, we are upt to imagine, not very grateful to English cars, but one to which they had already been fornewhat accustomed from the mouth of Eliza-He added, That all their privileges were derived from his grant, and hoped they would not turn them against him"; a sentiment which, from her conduct, it is certain that princets had also entertained, and which was the reigning principle of her courtiers and minimers, and the foring of all ber adminification.

The commons were in some perpicality. Their eyes were now opened, and they has the confequences of that power which had been allowed by the chancellor, and to which their predecellors had, in fome infrances, blindly followings. By this courfe, faid a member, the free exett i of the envelor is taken areay, and none should be chain but it in as shall pleafe the king and corned. Int we, therefore, with fortitude, understanding, and fire it, feek to maintain our privilege. This cannot be construct any contempt in us, but merely a resistence of our common rights, wellich our and files have left us and which it is just and sit for us so transmit to h Jouin. Afth Mach 1604. d Jouin 3d April 1604. P to [Al] at the critist the volume. [1] Camden, In Lennet, p. 375. " jouin. ryth March, ich April 2604.

XLV. 1604.

CHAP. our pesserity". Another said , This may be called a quo warranto to scize all our liberties. A chancellor, added a third, by this courfe, may call a parliament consisting of what persons he pleases. Any suggestion, by any person, may be the cause of sending a new It is come to this plain question, Whether the chancery or parliament ought to have authority ? ?

Norweristanding, this watchful spirit of liberty, which now appeared in the commons, their deference for majesty was so great, that they appointed a committee to confer with the judges before the king and council. There the question of law began to appear, in James's eyes, a little more doubtful than he had hitherto imagined it; and in order to extricate hindelf with tome honour, he proposed that both Goodwin and Fortescue should be set aside, and a writ be iffact, by warrant of the house, for a new excetion. Goodwin gave his confent, and the commons embraced the expedient; but in fuch a manner, that while they shewed their regard for the king, they fecured for the future the free pof-· fession of their seats, and the right which they claimed, of judging folely in their own elections and returns 1.

A POWER like this, so essential to the exercise of all their other powers, themselves to esential to public liberty, cannot fairly be deemed an encroachment in the commons; but must be regarded as an inherent privilege, happily releued from that ambiguity which the negligence of some former parliaments had thrown upon it.

Are the fame time the commons, in the cafe of fir Thomas Shirley, established their power of punishing, as well the perfors at whose fuit any member is acrested, as the officers who either arrest or deeain him. Their afferting of this privilege admits of the lane reflection '.

n Jouin. 30th Murch 1864. ' Id. ibid. ' P Id. ibid. 9 Securite [12] at the end of the volume. I Journ. 6th and 7th May 1604.

About this period, the minds of men throughout Europe, especially in England, seem to have undergone a general, but insensible revolution. Though letters had been revived in the preceding age, they were chiefly cultivated by those of sedentary professions; nor had they, till now, begun to spread themselves, in any degree, among men of the world. Arts, both mechanical and liberal, were every day receiving great improvements. Navigation had extended itself over the whole globe. Travelling was secure and agreeable. And the general system of politics in Europe was become more enlarged and comprehensive.

In confequence of this universal fermentation, the ideas of men enlarged themselves on all sides; and the feveral conflituent parts of the Gothic governments, which feem to have lain long unactive, began, every where, to operate and encroach on each other. On the continent, where the necessity of discipline had begotten standing armier, the princes commonly established an unlimited authority, . and overpowered, by force or intrigue, the liberties of the people. In England, the love of freedom, which, unless checked, flourishes extremely in all liberal natures, acquired new force, and was regulated by more enlarged views, fuitable to that cultivated understanding which became, every day, more common among men of birth and education. A familiar acquaintance with the precious remains of antiquity excited, in every generous breaft, a patlion for a limited constitution, and begat an emulation of those manly virtues, which the Greek and Roman authors, by fuch animating examples, as well as pathetic expressions, recommend to as. The severe, though popular government of Elizaboth had confined this rising spirit within very narrow bounds: But when a new and a foreign family fucceeded to the throne, and a prince less dreaded and less .C 3 . beloved,

16c4.

снар, beloved, fymptoms immediately appeared of a моге

free and independent genius in the nation.

HAPPILY this prince possessed neither sufficient capacity to perceive the alteration, nor fufficient art and vigour to check it in its curly advances. Jeplous of regal, because conscious of little personal authority, he had established within his own mind a speculative system of absolute government, which few of his fubjects, he believed, and more but traitors and rebels, would make any ferm le to admit. On whichever fide he cail his eye, every thing concurred to encourage his prejudice. When he compared himself with the other bereditary for vereigns of Europe, he imagined, that as he hore the same rank, he was entitled to equal prero tailer; not confidering the innovations lately retrosured by them, and the military force by which their adthority was supported. In England, that power, almost unlimited, which had been exercised for above a century, especially during the late reign, he afcribed foldly to royal birth and title; not to the prudence and spirit of the monarcles, nor to the conjunctures of the times. Even the opposition which he had throughed with in Scotland concurred him fill farther in his tayout ite notiona; while he there faw, that the fame seldled a victory is in real authority, violated all law and carder, maker was a cy either for the rayae, so it basica men see . . or for the more intularable in elercical deliberty acher. In his own perion, read reads the them in the testal power to be center a loven handle editor, and a dising right: And this cam a might but proved detegerous, if not fatal, to the rev. had rea the removels of the perfundion, and its feconing evidence, induced Lim to trust solgly to his right, without making the fmallest provision, either of force or politics, in order to support it.

Such

1604

Such were the opposite dispositions of parliament CHA and prince, at the commencement of the Scottish line; dispositions just beginning to exist and to appear in the parliament, but thoroughly established and openly avowed on the part of the prince.

The spirit and judgment of the honse of commons appeared, not only in defence of their own privileges, but also in their Endeavour, though, at this time, in vain, to fice trade from those shackles which the high exerted prerogetive, and even, in this respect, the ill-judged tyram y of Elizabeth, had imposed upon it.

James had already, of his even accord, called in and annulled all the numerous patents for monopelies which had been granted by his predecessor, and which extremely fettered every species of domellic industry: But the exclusive companie. Hill remained; another species of monepels, by which abnothall foreign trade, except that to France, was brought into the hands of a few rapazions engroffers, and all prospect of future improvement in commerce was for ever facilitied to a little temporary advantage of the lovereign. Thefe companies, though arbitrarily elected, had carried their privile, es to far, that almost all the confinerce of Fig. and was centered in London; and it appears that the cultoms of that port amounted to a occost, a-year, while those of all the kingdom befile yielded only feventeen thousand. Nay, the whole trade of London was confined to about two hundred citizens", who were cafily enabled, by combining among themfelves, to fix whatever price they pleased both to the exports and imports of the nation. The committee appointed to examine this enormous grievance, one of the greatest which we read of in English story, . infift on ir as a fact well known and aboved, however contrary to present received opinion, that ship-

See n te [C] at the end of the volume. ¹ Journ. 21 May 1604.

100-

CHAP, ping and feamen had fenfibly decayed during all the preceding reign ". And though nothing be more common than complaints of the decay of trade even during the most slourishing periods; yet is this a confequence which might maturally refult from fuch arbitrary establishments, at a time when the commerce of all the other nations of Europe, except that of Scotland, enjoyed full liberty and indulgence.

WHILE the commons were thus attempting to give liberty to the trading part of the nation, they alfo endeavoured to free the landed property from the burthen of wardships,', and to remove those remains of the feudal tenures under which the nation still laboured. A just regard was shewn to the crown in the conduct of this affair; mer was the remedy fought for, confidered as a matter of right, but mercly of grace and favour. The profit which the king reaped, both from wards and from relpite of homage, was eltimated; and it was intended to compound for these prerogatives by a feetire and independent revenue. But after forme debates in the house, and fome conferences with the lords, the affair was found to contain more difficulties than could eatily, at that time, be furmounted; and it was not then brought to any conclusion.

THE fame fate attended an attempt of a like nature, to free the nation from the burthen of purvey-This prerogative had been much abused by the purveyors'; and the commons fliewed fome, intention to offer the king fifty thousand pounds a-year for the abbillion of it.

Anormer affair of the utmost consequence was brought before the parliament, where the commons

* Journ. 1 June 1504. , 1 Junn. 30 April 1604

[&]quot; A remonstrance from the Trinity house, in 1602, figs, that in a little above twelve years after 1588, the shipping and number of seamen in long and decreed about a third. At gloley's happy forms State of Reola, a, p. 128, from'en Julies Cafar's Collections. See Journ. 21 May 1 340

shewed a greater spirit of independence than any true CHAP. judgment of national interest. The union of the two kingdoms was zealoufly, and even impatiently urged by the king . He justly regarded it as the peculiar selicity of his reign, that he had terminated the bloody animodities of these hostile nations, and had reduced the whole island under one government; enjoying tranquillity within itself, and fecurity from all foreign invasions. He hoped, that while his subjects of both kingdoms reflected out past disasters, besides regarding his perfon as infinitely precious, they would entertain the strongest defire of securing themselves against the return of like calamities, by a thorough union of laws, parliaments, and privileges. He con-Adered not, that this very reflection operated, as yet, in a contrary manner on men's prejudices, and kept plive that mutual hatred between the pations, which had been carried to the greatest extremities, and required time to allay it. The more urgent the king appeared in promoting to ulcful a measure, the more backward was the English parliament in concurring with him; while they afer bed his excessive zeal, to that partiality in favour of his ancient subjects, of which they thought, that, on other occasions, they had reason to complain. Their complaisance for the king, therefore, carried them no farther than to appoint forty-four English to meet with thirty-one Scottill commissioners, in order to deliberate concerning the terms of a union; but without any power of making advances towards the establishment of it ...

THE fame spirit of independence, and perhaps not better judgment, appeared in the house of commons when the question of supply was brought before them, by fome members attached to the court. In vain was it urged, that, though the king received a fup-, ply which had been voted to Elizabeth, and which ² Journ. & r April, r May, 1604. Payliamentary History, vol. v. ² Journ. 7 June 1604. Kennet, p. 6/3.

CHAP, had not been collected before her death; yet he found it burthered with a debt contracted by the queen, equal to the full amount of it: That peace was not yet thoroughly concluded with Spain, and that Ireland was flill expensive to him: That on his journey from Scotlaad; amidli froh a concentric of people, and on that of the queen and royal fourly, he had er i ided confiderable fum : A d that as the courtiers had looked for greater liberalities from the prince on his accession, and had imposed on his generous nature; fo the prince, in his turn, world expect, at the beginning, force mark of day and attachment from his people, and fome confidencion of his necessities. No impression was a side on the house of commons by these topics; and the negotite appeared fully determined to teleficall feeply. The burthen of government, at that time, by actionic by light upon the people: And that very reason, which to us, at this distance, may feem a motive of generofity, was the real cause why the pack and it was, on all occasions, so remarkably tragal and reterred. They were not, as yet, accuiloned to open their purses in so liberal a manner as their success rs, in order to supply the wants of their sovereign; and the finallett denumd, he wever requifice, appeared in their eyes unreasonable and exorbitant. The commons from also to have been defirens of reducing the crown to dill farther necessions, by their returng a bill, fent down to them by the lords, for entailing the crown lands for ever on the king's heirs and fueceffors". The diffication, made by Elizabeth, had probably taught-James the necessity of this law, and shown them the advantage of reluling it.

> In order to cover a diappointment with regard to Supply, which might bear a had confliction, both at home and abroad, james fent a medage to the houle', in which he told them, that he defired no CHAP. full ply; and he was very forward in refuling what was never offered him. Soon after, he prorogued the parliament, not without discovering, in his speech, 7th July. vitible, marks of diffatisfaction. Even fo early in his reign, he faw reason to make public complaints of the reffless and encroaching spirit of the puritanical party, and of the undevolence with which they endeavoured to inspire the compans. Nor were his complaints without foundation, or the puritans without interest; fince the commons, now finding themfelves free from the arbitrary government of Elizabeth, made application for a conference with the lords, and pretented a petition to the king; the purport of both which was, to procure, in favour of the puritans, a relaxation of the colembical laws 4. The ale of the simplice, and of the cross in baptism, is there chiese complained of: but the remedy feems to have been expected tolely from the king's difpenfing power'. In the papers which contain this application and retition, we may also see proofs of the violent animas ty of the commons against the " catholics, together with the intolerating spirit of that affembly '.

Pathacaentary History, vol. v. p 108.

This function the peace with Spain was finally research concluded, and was figured by the Spanish ministers Space at London". In the conferences, previous to this treaty, the nations were found to have fo few claims on each other, that, except on account of the support given by Logland to the Low Country provinces, the war might appear to have been continued more on account of perional animoticy between Philip and Elizabeth, than any contradict of polyical interests between their fubjects. Some articles in the treaty,

18 h Aug.

which

Joun. 26 June 1604 . "d La B. Jerre, the French am! Miller," i stay, that the house of commons was composed aboutly of part ans, * ulimien'my Aikory, vol. v. p 98, 99, 150. vol 1. p. 81, f See note [D] at the end of the volume tom, xvi. p. 585, &c.

CHAP, which feemed prejudicial to the Dutch commonwealth, were never executed by the king; and as the Spaniards made no complaints on that head, it appeared that, by fecret agreement, the king had expressly referved the power of fending affiltance to the Hollanders h. The constable of Castile came into England to ratify the peace; and on the part of England, the earl of Hertford was fent into the Low Countries for the faine purpose, and the carl of Nottingham, high admiral, into Spain. The train of the latter was numerous and fplendid; and the Spaniards, it is faid, were extremely furprifed, when they beheld the blooming countenances and graceful appearance of the English, whom their bigotry, inslamed by the priefts, had represented as fo many monsters and infernal dæmons.

> Though England, by means of her naval force, was perfectly fecure during the latter years of the Spanish war, James shewed an impatience to put an end to hostilities; and foon after his accession, before any terms of peace were concerted, or even propoled by Spain, he recalled all the letters of marque ' which had been granted by queen Elizabeth. Archduke Albert had made fome advances of a like nature k, which invited the king to take this friendly step. But what is remarkable; in James's proclamation for that purpose, he plainly supposes, that, as he had himself, while king of Scotland, always lived in amity with Spain, peace was attached to his person, and that merely by his accession to the crown of England, without any articles of treaty or agreement, he had ended the war between the kingdoms. This igno-

F Winwood, vol. ii. p. 27. 330, et alil . In this respect James's peace was more honomable than that which I carry IV, himtelf made with *pun. This letter prince stepulated not to allest the Dutch; and the supplies which he secretly fent them, were in durêt contravention to i 23d of June 1603. - k Grottii Annal. the treaty. I See proclamations during the first seven years of lib. 12. Winwood, vol. ii. p. 65. K. James rance of the law of nations may appear furprising CHAP. in a prince, who was thirty-fix years of age, and XLV. who had reigned from his infancy; did we not cenfider, that a king of Scotland, who lives in close friendship with England, has few transactions to manage with foreign princes, and has little opportunity of acquiring experience. Unhappily for James, his timidity, his prejudices, his indolence, his love of amusement, particularly of hunting, to which he was much addicted, ever prevented him from making any progress in the knowledge or practice of foreign politics, and in a little time diminished that regard which all the neighbouring nations had paid to England during the reign of his predeceffor

[&]quot; Memoirs de la Bodeiie, vol. i. p. 64. 181. 195. 217. 302. vol. 11. p. 244. 278.

C H A P. XLVI.

CHAP.

1604.

memorable that history has conveyed to posterity, and containing at once a fingular proof both of the strength and weakness of the human mind; its widest departure from mer d., and most steady attachment to religious projudies. It is the Gunpowder treason of which I speak; a face as certain as it appears incredible.

Gunpowder confpiracy.

THE Roman catholics End expedied great favour and indulgence on the accessors of James, both as he was deicended from Mary, whele life they believed to have been facrificed to their cause, and as he himfelf, in his early youth, was imagined to have shewn fome partiality towards them, which nothings they thought, but interest and necessary had fince restrained. It is pretended, that he had even entered into politive engagements to tolerate their religion, as foon as he flould mount the throne of England; whether then circlulity had interpreted in this fende forme obliging expressions of the king's, or that he had employed tuch an artifice, in order to render them favourable to his title'. Very foon they discovered their mistake; and were at once furprised and enraged to find James, on all occafions, express his intention of strictly executing the , laws enacted against them, and of persevering in all the rigorous measures of Elizabeth. Catefby, a gentleman of good parts and of, an ancient family,

^{*} State Trivis, vol. ii. p. 201, 202, 203. Wirwood, vol. ii. p. 49.

first thought of a most extraordinary, method of CHAP, revenge; and he opened his intention to Piercy, XLVI. a descendant of the illustrious house of Northumberland. In one of their convertations with regard to the distressed condition of the catholics, Piercy having broken into a fally of pailion, and mentioned affillinating the king; Catefly took the opportunity of revealing to him a noblem and more extensive plan of treafon, which not only included a fare execution of vengeance, but afforded fome hopes of refloring the cathotic religion in England. In vain, faid he, would you put an end to the King's life: Hie has children, who would inveced both to his crown and to his reasons of government. In vain would you enalogeith the whole reval ismily: The nobility, the gently, the parliment, are all infected with the fame herely, and could raile to the throne another prince and another landly, who, belides their haired to our religion, would be animated with revenge for the tragical death of their predecessors. To serve any good parpose, we must destroy, at one blow, the king, the regal family, the lords, the commons; and bary all our enamies in one common ruin. Happily, they are all affembled on the first meeting of the parliament; and afford us the opportunity of glorious and afeful vengenice. Great preparations will not be requisite. A few of us, combining, may run-a mine below the hall in which they meet; and choosing the very moment when the king harangues both houses, confign over to destruction these determined foes to all picty and religion. Meanwhile, we ourselves standing aloof, safe and unsuspected, shall triumph in being the instruments of divine wrath, and shall behold with pleasure those facrilegious walls, in which were passed the edicts for proscribing our church and Butchering her children, tossed into a thousand fragments; while their impious sinhabitants, meditating, perhaps, still new persecutions against us, pass

CHAP. from flames above to flames below, there for ever to endure the torments due to their offences?

> Piercy was charmed with this project of Catesby; and they agreed to communicate the matter to a few more, and among the rest to Thomas Winter, whom they fent over to Fianders, in quell of Fawkes, an officer in the Spanish service, with whose zeal and courage they were all thoroughly acquainted. When they inlifted any new conspirator, in order to bind him to fecrefy, they always, together with an oath, employed the Communion, the most sacred rite of their religion ^p. And it is remarkable, that no one of thefe pious devotees ever entertained the least compunction with regard to the critel maffacre which they projected, of whatever was great and eminent in the Some of them only were flartled by the reflection, that of necessity many catholics must be prefent; as spectators or attendants on the king, or as having feats in the house of peers: But Tesmond, a Jesuit, and Garnet, superior of that order in England, removed these scruples, and shewed them how the interests of religion required that the innocent should here be facrificed with the guilty.

> ALL this passed in the spring and summer of the year 1004; when the conspirators also hired a house in Piercy's name, adjoining to that in which the parliament was to assemble. Towards the end of that year they began their operations. That they might be less interrupted, and give less suspicion to the neighbourhood, they carried in store of provisions with them, and never defisted from their labour. Obstinate in their purpose, and consirmed by passion, by principle, and by mutual exhortation, they little feared death in comparison of a disappointment; and having provided arms, together with the instruments of their labour, they resolved there to perish in case of a discovery. Their perseverance advanced the work; and they soon pierced the wall, though three yards in thickness; but on approaching the other side, they were somewhat startled at hearing a noise, which they knew not how to account for. Upc inquiry, they sound that it came from the vault below the house of tords; that a magazine of coals had been kept there; and that, as the coals were aching on, the vault would be let to the highest bidder. The opportunity was immediately seized: the place hired by Piercy; thirty-fix barrels of powder iodged in it; the whole covered up with taggots and bilets: the doors of the ceilar boldly thing open; and every body admitted, as if it contained nothing dangerous.

[·] History of the Gunpowder Treason.

P State Trials, vol. i. p. 190. 198. 210.

Confident of inceels, they now began to look forward, and to plan the remaining part of their project. The king, the queen, prince Henry, were all expected to be prefent at the opening of parliament. The duke, by reason of his tender age, · would be ablent; and is was refolved, that Piercy should feize him, or affassinate him. The princess Elizabeth, a child likewife, was kept at lord Harrington's houle at Warwickshire; and sir Everard Digby, Rookwood, Grant, being let into the conspiracy, engaged to assemble their friends on pretence of a hunting match, and seizing that princess, immediately to proclaim her queen. So transported were they with rage against their adversaries, and so charmed with the prospect of revenge, that they forgot all care of their own safety; and trusting to the general confusion, which must result from so unexpected a blow, they foresaw not, that the fury of the people, now unrestrained by any authority; must have turned against them, and would probably have satiated itself, by an universal massacre of the outholics.

THE day, so long wished for, now approached, on which the parliament was appointed to assemble. Vol. VI.

D

The

MISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

(1/Z, 7)

Hara The dreadful fecret, though communicated to above twents persons, had been religiously kept, during the space of near a year and a half. No remorfe, no pity, no fear of punishment, no hepe of reward, had, as vet, induced any one conspirator, either to abandon the enterprise; or make a discovery of it. The holy fury had extinguished in their breath every other motive; and it was an indifferetion at last. proceeding chiefly from thele very bigoted prejudices and partialities, which faved the nation.

Ten days before the meeting of parliament, lord Monteagle, a catholic, fon to lord Morley, received the following letter, which had been delivered to his ferwant by an unknown hand. My Lord, Out of the love I bear to fome of your friends, I have a care of your preferention. Therefore I recould advise you, as you tender your life, to devife fome excuse to Shift off your attendance at this parliament. For God and man bave concurred to punilb the wickedness of this time. And think not flightly of this advertisement; but retire yourfelf into your country, where you may expect the event in fafety. For though there be no appearance of any Rir, yet, I fay, they will receive a terrible blow this parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This counsel is not to be contemned, because it may do you good, and can do you no harm: For the danger is ps/i, as foon as you have burned the letter. And I Hope God will give you the grace to make good use of it, unto whose holy protection I commend you 4.

Montiagle knew not what to make of this letter; and though inclined to think it a soolith attempt to frighten and ridicule him, he judged it fasest to carry it to lord Salisbury, secretary of state. Though Salisbury too was inclined to pay little attention to it, he thought proper to lay it before the king, who came to town a few days after. To the king it appeared not so light a matter; and from the serious earnest style of the letter, he conjectured, that it implied fomething dangerous and important. A terrible blows, and yet the authors concialed; a danger fo fudden, and ye' fo great; these circumstances seemed all to denote some contrivance by gunpowder; and it was thought advisable to inspect all the vaults below the houses of parliament. This care belonged to the earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain; who purposely delayed the search, till the day before the meeting of parliament. He remarked those great piles of wood and saggots which lay in the vault under the upper house; and he cast his eye upon Fawkes, who flood in a dark corner, and passed himself for Piercy's servant. That daring and determined courage, & hich fo much diffinguished this confpirator, even among thole herees in villany, was fully painted in his countenance, and was not paffed unnoriced by the chamberlain '. Seeli a quantity also of fael, for the use of one who leed to little in town as Piercy, appeared a little entraordinary; and upon comparing all circumitances, it was resolved that a more thorough inspection should be made. About midnight, fir homes knevet, a justice of peace, was fent with proper attendants; and before the door of the vault finding Fawkes, who had just finished all his preparations, he immediately feized him, and turning over the faggots; discovered the powder. The matches and every thing proper for fetting fire to the train were taken in Fawkes's . pocket; who finding his guilt now apparent, and feeing no refuge but in boldness and despair, expressed the utmost regret, that he had lost the opportunity of firing the powder at once, and of sweetening his own death by that of his enemies '. Before the council, he displayed the same intrepid firmness, mixed even with fcorn and disdain; resusing to discover his ! Ibid. p. 120!

⁴ K. James's Works, p. 227.

 ΣUVL

1605.

s Id ibid.

K. James's Works, p. 229.

2 H A P. accomplices, and shewing no concern but for the failure of the enterprise". I his obstinacy lasted two or three days: But being confined to the Tower, left to rellect on his guilt and danger, and the rack being just shown to him; his courage, fatigued with to long an effort, and unsupported by hope or fociety, at last failed him; and he made a full discovery of all the confpirators *.

CATESBY, Piercy, and the other criminals, who were in London, though they had heard of the alarm taken at a letter fent to Monteagle; though they had heard of the chamberlain's fearch; yet were refolved to perfift to the utmost, and never abandon their hopes of fucceis. But at last, hearing that Fawkes was arrested, they hurried down to Warwickshire: where fir Everard Digby, thinking himself assured that success had attended his confederates, was already in arms, in order to scize the princess Elizabeth. she had chaped into Coventry; and they were obliged to put themselves on their defence against the counmy, who were raifed from all quarters, and armed, by the flictifl. The conspirators, with all their attendants, never exceeded the number of eighty persons; and being furrounded on every fide, could no longer emeriain hopes, either of prevailing or escaping. Having therefore confessed themselves, and received abiolation, they boldly prepared for death, and relogged to fell their lives as dear as possible to the assailans. But even this miserable confolation was de-Some of their powder took fire, and difabled them for defence. The people rushed in Piercy and Catefby were killed by one , apon them. thot. Digby, Rookwood, Winter, and others, being taken pritoners, were tried, confessed their guilt, and

^{* *} K. James's Works, p. 231. * Winwood, vol. ii. p. 173.

y See note [E] at the end of the volumer 2 State Trials, vol. i. p. 199. Discourse of the manner, &c. p. 69, died, as well as Garnet, by the hands of the exe-CHAP cutioner. Notwithstanding this horrid crime, the XIVI bigoted catholics were to devoted to Garnet, that they fancied miracles to be wrought by his blood "; and in Spain he was regarded as a marryr ...

NEITHER had the desperate fortune of the conspirators urged them to this enterprise, nor had the former profligacy of their lives prepared them for fo great a crime. Before that audacious attempt, their conduct feems, in general, to be liable to no reproach. Catefby's character had entitled him to fuch regard, that Rookwood and Dighy were feduced by their implicit trust in his judgment; and they declared, that, from the motive alone of friendthip to him, they were ready, on any occasion, to have facrificed their lives '. Digby himself was as highly ellecmed and beloved as any man in England; and he had been particularly honoured with the good opinion of queen Elizabeth". It was bigoted zeal alone, the most absurd of prejudices masqued with reason, the . most criminal of possions covered with the appearance of duty, which feduced them into measures, that were fital to themselves, and had so nearly proved satal to their country .

THE lords Mordaunt and Stourton, two catholics, sere fined, the former ten thousand pounds, the latter four thousand, by the star-chamber; because their absence from parliament had begotten a suspicion of their being acquainted with the conspiracy. The earl of Northumberland was fined thirty thousand pounds, and detained several years prisoner in the fower.

⁻ Winwood, vol. ii. p. 300. b Id. ibid.

⁴ Ashen, Ox. you is to be real State Titals, vol. 1. p. 201.

Digby, after his condemnation, faid in a letter to his wolk " Now for my intention, let me tell you, that if I had thought there " had been the leaft fin in the plot, I would not have been of it for all the world; and no other cause drew mee to haved my sortune " and lite, but zeal to God's religion." He expresses his imprife to hear that any catholics had condemned it. Digby's pager gabapter Swetary Covertry.

- h

CHAP. Tower; because, not to mention other grounds of fulpicion, he had admitted racrey into the number of gentlemen penfloners, villaout his taking the recallite or the '.

> THE king, in his speech to the parliament, obferved, that, though religion had engaged the conspirators in 40 criminal an attempt, yet ought we not to involve all the Roman catholics in the lame guilt, or suppose them equally disposed to commit such enormous barbariles. Many holy men, he faid, and our ancellors among the rell, had been feduced to concur with that chance, in hir scholastic doctrines, who yet had never adadited her feditious principles, concerning the penc's power of dethroning kings, or functifying affairmation. The wrath of Heaven is demounced against crimes, but innocent error may oldain its farour; and nothing can be more hatchel tum the uncharitableness of the puritans, who condown alke to cternal terments, even the most inonantive partitions of popery. For his part, he added, that containacy, however atrocions, should never alter, in the leaft, his plan of government: While with end hand he punished guilt; with the other he would ttill support and proced hanocence. After this speech, he prorogued the parliament till the 22d of January '.

THE moderation, and, I may fay, magnanimity, of the king, immediately after fo narrow in escape from a most detellable conspiracy, was nowise agreeable to his subjects. Their animosity against popery, even before this provocation, had rifen to a great pitch; and it had perhaps been more prudent in

P. K. James's Works, p. 503, 504. f Camden in Krunet, p. 697. h The parliament, this fellion, paffed an act obliging every one to take the oath of allegiance: A very moderate tell, fince it decided no controverted ; oin s between the two religious, and only engaged the performs who tank it to abjure the popu's power of dethroning kings. Sec K. Janv Ss Works, p. 250.

James, by a little delimedation, to have conformed CENT. himself to it. His theological learning, continued CENT. by disputation, had happily fixed his judgment in the protestant faith; yet was his heart a little bialled by the allurements of Rome, and he had been well pleafed, if the making of fome advances could have effected an union with that ancient mother-church. He throve to abate the actimony of his own lubjects gainst the religion of their fathers: He became timble the object of their diffidence and avertion. Whatever measures he embraced; in Scotland to introduce prelact, in England to enforce the authorrity of the established church, and support it rites and ceremonies, were interpreted as fo many fleps towards popery; and were repreferred by the puritais as fymptoms of idolatry and fugerflicion. Ignorant of the confequences, or unvillage to tacritice to politics his inclination, which he called his confeience, he perferered in the fame menfores, and gave trust and preferment, almost inditeremly, to his catholic and protestant subjects. And finding his perfon, as well as his title, lefs showings to the church of Rome, than these of Elizabeth, he gradually abated the rigour of those laws, which had been enacted against that church, and which were to acceptable to his bigoted fubjects. But the effects or these dispositions on both tides became not very tenfible till towards the conclution of his reign.

affections even of his English subjects, and, in a tolerable degree, their esteem and regard. If thereo their complaints were chiefly levelled against his too great constancy in his early friendships; a quality which, had it been attended with more occurring, the wife would have excused, and the caudid would even, perhaps, have applauded. His part, which were not despicable, and his learning, which was great, being highly extelled by his courtiers and gownmen, and not yet tried in the management of

•D 4

IRS

BUCG.

A parliament,

CHAP, any delicate affairs, for which he was unfit, raifed a high idea of him in the world; nor was it always through flattery or infinentity that he received the title of the fecond Solomon. A report, which was forddenly thread about this time, of his being affaffinated, villibir ffruck a great configuration into all orders of ment. The containers also abated, this tefficult in new his of their exective frugality, and granted lish, on old, payane in lour years, of three sublidies and fix nacemba, which ar Francis Bacon ead in the bourb's night amount to about four hundred thendand permiss. And for once the king and parliament part combiendthip and good humour. The Latred which the catholics fo vifibly bore him, game lend a ministere, an additional value in the eye of ris people. The only confiderable point in which the commons incurred his difpholonic, was by all covering their conflant goodwill be the purians, in whose layour they defined a concerence with the leads 1: Which was rejected.

Tour chief affair tradheled next felfon, was the invitaled union of the two kingdoms". Nothing could exceed the king's pailton and zeal for this not be enterprife, but the parliament's prejudice and a lactonce against it. There remain two excellent specials in favour of the union, which it would not be improper to compare together; that of the king", and that of hir Francis Bacon. Those, who affect in every thing fuch an extreme contempt for James, will be surprifed to find, that his discourie both for good reatoring and cloquent composition. approaches very near that of a man, who was undoubtedly, at that time, one of the greatest geninsein Europe. A few trivial indifcretions and indecorums may be, taid to characterize the harangue of the monarch, and mark it for his own. And, in general, so open and avowed a declaration in favour of a measure, while he had taken no care, by any precaution or intrigue, to ensure success, may fasely be pronounced an indiscretion. But the art of managing parliaments, by private interest or cabal, being found hitherto of little use or necessity, had not, as yet, become a part of English politics. In the common course of assairs; government could be conducted without their assistance; and when their concurrence became necessary to the measures of the crown, it was, generally speaking, except in times of great faction and discontent, obtained without much difficulty.

Journ. 5th Amii 4606. P. K. James's Works, p. 509.

^{, &}amp; Journ. 20th May 1805. 1 Kennet, p. 676. m Kennet, p. 6-6

Title king's influence feems to have rendered the Scottish parliament cordial in all the steps which they took towards the union. Though the advantages which Scotland might hope from that meafure were more confiderable; yet were the objections too, with regard to that kingdom, more striking and obvious. The benefit which must have refulted to England, both by accession of strength and fecurity, was not despicable; and as the English were by far the greater nation, and possessed the scat of government, the objections, either from the point of honour, or from jealoufy, could not reasonably have any place among them. The English parliament indeed feem to have been fwayed merely by the vulgar motive of sational antipathy. And they perfifted fo obstinately in their prejudices, that all the efforts for a thorough union and incorporation ended only in the abolition of the hostile laws formerly enacted between the kingdoms.

Some

The commons were even so averse to the union, that they had complained in the former session to the lords, of the bishop of Bristol, for writing a book in favour of it; and the presame was obliged to make submissions for this offence. The crone imputed to him seems to have consisted in his treating of a tubical which say before the parliament. So little notion had they as yet of a facial liberty! See Parliamentary History, vol. v. p. 103, 109, 110.

MAI. 31.28.

enter. Some precipitate steps which the king, a little after his accession, had taken, in order to promote his favourite project, had been bece observed to do mere injury than fervice. From his own authority, he had assumed the title of the of Great Britain; and had quintered the arms of Scotland, with those of England, in all coins, page, and enfigus. He had ado engaged the judges to make a declaration, that all there who, after the union of the crowns, thould be born in Cilia kingdom, were, for that reason alone, nature limit in both. This was a nice specifical, and lace it is the ideas of those times, susceptible of sected morning on both sides. The king was the a me: The parliaments were different. Postader to people therefore the how, we must fupp to that the reversion authority not led chiefly in Co prine , and that thefe popular attemblies were rather bodies of coulin with money and advice, than endoved with any controlling or active powers in the government. It is realist, fays Bacon in his pleadings of this fubject, that all other communirecollibe, and clies only excepted, do subjet by a law process it. . There authority is divided among ft rune govers and they not perpetual, but annual or temporary, a not to receive their authority but by election, and evinin perfons too have voices only in that cheston, and the like; thefe are buy and turious frames, and the of macining do prelapposa a law precedent, written or emerities, to guide and direct them: But in n marches, officially hereditary, that is, when feweral families or lineages of people do submit themselves to one line, isnothial or royal, the submission is more meteral and fimple; which afterwards, by law subjequent, is perfected, and made more formal; but that is grounded upon nature. It would feem from this reasoning, that the idea of a hereditary, limited monarchy, though implicitly supposed in many public-

P Bacon's Works, vol. iv. p. 190, 191, edit. 1730. transactions, transactions, had scarcely ever, as yet, been expressly CHAP.

formed by any English lawyer or politician.

Except the obstinacy of the parliament with regard to the union, and an attempt on the king's ecclesiastical jurisdiction, most, of their measures, during this session, were sufficiently respectful and obliging; though they still discover a vigilant spirit and a careful attention towards national liberty. The voter also of the commons show, that the house contained a mixture of puritans, who had acquired great authority among them', and who, together with religious prejudices, were continually suggesting ideas more suitable to a popular than a monarchical form of government. The natural appetite for rule made the commons lend a willing ear to every doctrine which tended to angment their own power and influence.

Merition was moved in the lower house for a more rigorous execution of the laws against popular recusants, and an abatement towards protestant elergymen, who scrupled to observe the ceremonies. Both these points were equally unacceptable to the king; and he sent orders to the house to proceed no farther in that matter. The commons were inclined, at sirst, to consider these orders as a breach of privilege. But they soon acquisited, when told that this measure of the king's was supported by many precedents during the reign of Elizabeth. Had they been always disposed to make the precedents of that reign the rule of their conduct, they needed never have had any quarrel with any of their monarchs.

THE complaints of Spanish depredations were 5th June. very loud among the English merchants. The lower house sent a message to the lords, desiring a-⁹ Journ. 2 December, 5 March, 1606. 35, 26 June 1607.

Journ. 26 February, 4, 7 March 1606. 2 May, 17 June 1607.
Journ. 16, 17 June 1607.
Journ. 25 Feb. 1606.

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

HAP. conference with them, in order to their presenting a joint petition to the king on the subject. The lords took some time to deliberate on this message; because, they said, the matter was weighty and rave. It probably occurred to them at first, that the parliament's interposing in assairs of state would appear unusual and extraordinary. And, to show that in this sentiment they were not guided by court influence: after they had deliberated, they agreed to the centerence.

The house of commons began now to feel themfelves of such importance, that on the motion of fir Edwin Sandys, a smember of great authority, they entered, for the first time, an order for the regular keeping of their journals. When all butiness was finished; the king proregued the parliament.

Anomy this time there was an infurrection of the country people in Northamptonthire, headed by one Recorder, a man of law condition. They went about destroying inclosures; but carefully avoided cornnitting any other outrage. This infurrection was easily suppressed, and though great lenity was aifed towards the rioters, yet were fome of the ringleaders punished. The chief cause of that trivial commotion feetus to have been, of itself, far from trivial. The practice still continued in England, of dituting tillage, and throwing the land into incletures for the take of patture. By this means the kingdom was depopulated, at least prevented from increasing so much in people as might have been expected from the daily increase of industry and commerce.

But in the spring of the subsequent, after a long negotiation, was concluded, by a truce of twelve years; that war, which for near half a century had been carried on with such fury between Spain and the States of the CHAP. United Provinces. Never contest seemed, at first, XLVI. more unequal? Never contest was finished with more honour to the weaker party. On the fille of Spain Truce bewere numbers, riches, authority, discipline: On the fide of the revolted provinces, were found the at- the timed mehment to liberty and the enthusiasm of religion. By her naval enterprises the republic maintained her rmies; and, joining peaceful industry to military valour, the was enabled, by her own force, to support herfelf, and gradually rely lefs on those neighbouring princes, who, from jealoufy to Spain, were at first prompted to encourage her revolt. Long had the pride of that monarchy prevailed over her interest, and prevented her from hearkening to any terms of accommodation with her rebellious fubiects. But finding all intercourse cut off between her provinces by the maritime force of the States," the at last agreed to treat with them as a free people, and folemnly to renounce all claim and pretention to their fovereignty.

² Journ. 3 July 1607.

7th July.

1

This chief point being gained, the treaty was March 30. easily brought to a conclusion, under the joint mediation and guarantee of France and England. exterior appearances of honour were paid equally to both crowns: But very different were the fentiments which the States, as well as all Europe, entertained of the princes who wore them. Frugality and vigour, the chief circumstances which procure regard among foreign nations, shone out as conspicuously in Henry as they were deficient in James. To a contempt of the English monarch, Henry seems to have added a confiderable degree of jealoufy and aversion, which were sentiments altogether without foundation. James was just and fair in all transactions with his, alies *,

The plan of accommodation which James recognierded is found in Winwood, vol. ii. p. 429, 430.; and as the fame that was recom-

1604-Spain and Provinces.

but

XLVI. 1 . 9.

CHAP, but it appears from the memoirs of those times, that each fide deemed him partial towards their adverfary, and fancied that he had entered into sccret measures against them. So little equity have men in their addgments of their own affairs; and fo dangerous is that entire neutrality affected by the king of England!

stra. Feb. 9. ation of the THEFT

The little concern which James took in foreign offnirs renders the domestic occurrences, particularly those of parliament, the most interesting of his reign. A new session was held this spring; the king full of hopes of receiving supply; the commons of circumscribing his prerogative. The earl of Salithury, now created treaturer on the death of the carl of Dorlet, laid open the king's necessities, first to the peers, then to a committee of the lower house '. He infished on the unavoidable expence incurred in supporting the navy, and in suppressing a late infarrection in Ircland: He mentioned three numerous courts which the king was obliged to maintain, for himself, for the queen, and for the prince of Wales: He observed, that queen Elizabeth, though a fingle woman, had received very large supplies in the years preceding her death, which done were expensive to her: And he remarked that, during her reign, she had alienated many of the crown lands; an expedient which, though it supplied her present necessities, without laying burdens on her people, extremely multiplied the necessiries of her fuccessor. From all these causes he thought it nowife strange, that the king's income should fall mended by Henry, as we learn from Jeanin, tom. iii. p. 416, 417. It had long been imagined by historians from Jeanin's authority, that James had declared to the court of Spain, that he would not support the Dutch in their pretentions to liberty and independence. But it has fince been discolored by Winwood's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 456. 466. 469. 475, 176. that report was founded on a lie of president Richardot's.

Y Winwood an. Jeanin, possim, Kennet, p. 681.

Z Journ. 17 Feb. 1629.

fhort

thort to great a fum as eighty-one thousand pounds on any of his flated and regular expence; without men- XLVI. pening centingencies, which ought always to be elleemed a fourth of the yearly charges. And as the crown was now necessarily burdened with a great and urgent debt of aco,000 pounds, he thence inferred the absolute necessity of an immediate and large tupply from the people. To all their reasons, which lames likewife urged in a speech addressed to Machete both houses, the commons remained inexorable. But, not to shoes the king with an absolute refusal, they granted him one fablidy and one fifteenth; which would fearedly amount to a hundred thousand pounds. And James received the mortification of difcovering, in vain, all his wents, and of begging aid of subjects who had no reasonable indulgence or confideration for him.

Among the many causes of dilgust and quarrel, which now daily and unavoidably madeiplied between prince and parliament, this article of money is to be regarded as none of the least confiderable. After the discovery and conquest of the West Indies, gold and filver became every day more plentiful in England, as well as in the rest of Europe; and the price of all commodities and provisions role to a height beyond what had been known fince the decleniion of the Roman empire. As the revenue of the crown role not in proportion a, the prince was infenfibly reduced to poverty amidst the general riches of his subjects, and required additional funds, in order to support the fame magnificence and force which had been maintained by former monarchs. But, while money thus flowed into England, we may observe, that, at the same time, and probably from that very cause, arts and industry of all kinds received a mighty

1610.

Besides the great alienation of the crown lands, the see farm rents never increased, and the other lands were let on Sing leases, and at a great undervalue, little or nothing above the old rent: ,

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

XLVI. 1610.

CEAI mighty increase; and elegance in every enjoyment of life became better known, and more cultivated among all ranks of people. The king's fervants, both civil and military, his courtiers, his ministers, demanded more ample supplies from the impoverished prince, and were not contented with the fame fimplicity of living which had fatisfied their ancestors. The prince himself began to regard an increase of pomp and splendour as requisite to support the dignity of his character, and co preserve the same superiority above his subjects, which his predecessors had enjoyed. Some equality too, and proportion to the other fovereigns of Europe, it was natural for him to defire; and as they had univerfally enlarged their revenue, and multiplied their taxes, the king of England deemed it reasonable that his subjects, who were generally as rich as theirs, should bear with patience some additional burdens and impositions.

Unhappily for the king, those very riches, with the increasing knowledge of the age, bred opposite sentiments in his subjects; and, begetting a spirit of freedom and independence, disposed them to pay little regard either to the entreaties or menaces of their fovereign. While the barons possessed their former immense property and extensive surisdictions, they were apt, at every disgust, to endanger the monarch, and throw the whole government into confusion: But this contusion often, in its turn, proved favourable to the monarch, and made the nation again submit to him, in order to re-establish justice and tranquillity. After the power of alienations, as well as the increase of commerce, had thrown the balance of property into the hands of the commons, the situation of assairs, and the dispositions of men, became susceptible of a more regular plan of liberty; and the laws were not supported fingly by the authority of the fovereign. And though in that interval, terval, after the decline of the peers, and before the CHAP. people had eyet experienced their force, the princes assumed an exorbitant power, and had almost annihilated the constitution under the weight of their prerogative; as foon as the commons recovered from their lethargy, they feem to have been aftonished at the danger, and were resolved to secure liberty by firmer barriers than their ancestors had hitherto provided for it.

HAD James possessed a very rigid frugality, he might have warded off this crifis fomewhat longer; and waiting patiently for a favourable opportunity to increase and fix his revenue, might have secured the extensive authority transmitted to him. On the other hand, had the commons been inclined to act with more generofity and kindness towards their prince, they might probably have turned his irecessities to good account, and have bribed him to depart peaceably from the more dangerous articles of his prerogative. But he was a foreigner, and ignorant of the arts of popularity; they were soured by religious prejudices, and tenacious of their money: And, in this fituation, it is no wonder that, during this whole reign, we scarcely find an interval of mutual confidence and friendship between prince and parliament.

THE king, by his prerogative alone, had some years before altered the rates of the cultoms, and had established higher impositions on several kinds of merchandise. This exercise of power will naturally, to us, appear arbitrary and illegal; yet, according to the principles and practices of that time, it might admit of some apology. The duties of tonnage and poundage were at first granted to the crown, by a vote of parliament, and for a limited time; and as the grant frequently expired and was renewed, there could not stien arise any doubt concerning the origin of the king's right to levy these duties; and this imposition, like all Vel. VI. others,

XLVI. 1510.

Call A.P. others, was plainly derived from the voluntary confent of the people. But as Henry V. and all the fucceeding fovereigns had the revenue conferred on them for life, the prince, so long in possession of these duties, began gradually to consider them as his own proper right and inheritance, and regarded the vote of parliament as a mere formality, which rather expressed the acquicscence of the people in his prerogative, than bestowed any new gift or revenue upon him.

> THE parliament, when it first granted poundage to the crown, had fixed no particular rates: The imposition was given as a shilling a pound, or five per cent. on all commodities: It was left to the king himfelf, and the privy council, aided by the advice of fuch merchants as they should think proper to confult, to fix the value of goods, and thereby the rates of the customs: And as that value had been fettled before the discovery of the West-Indies, it was become much interior to the prices which almost all commodities bore in every market in Europe; and consequently, the customs on many goods, though supposed to be five per cent. was in reality much inferior. The king, therefore, was naturally led to think that rates which were now plainly false, ought to be corrected b; that a valuation of commodities, fixed by one act of the prive council, might be amended by another; that if his right to poundage were inherent in the crown, he should also possess, of himself, the right of correcting its inequalities; if this duty were granted by the people, he should at least support the spirit of the law, by fixing a new and a juster valuation of all commodities. But besides this reasoning, which seems plausible, if not folid, the king was supported in that acl of power by direct precedents, some in the reign of Mary, some in the beginning of Elizabeth'. Both these princesses had, without Chap consent of pa liment, altered the rates of commo- XI.VI. dities; and as their impositions had, all along, been submitted to without a murmur, and still continued to be levied, the king had no reason to apprehend that a further exertion of the same authority would give any occasion of complaint. That less umbrage might be taken, he was moderate in the new rates which he established: The customs, during his whole reign, rose only from 127,000 pounds a-year to 100.000; though, besides the increase of the rates, there was a fertible increase of commerce and induttry during that period: • Every commodity, bethat, which might lerve to the subhistence of the people, or might be confidered as a material of manufactures, was exempted from the new impositions of James': But all this caution could not prevent the complaints of the commons. A spirit of liberty had now taken possession of the house: The leading members, men of an independent genius and large views, began to regulate their opinions, more by the future confequences which they fereface their by the former precedents which were let before them; and they less aspired at maintaining the ancient constitution, than at ellablishing a new one, and a freer, and a better. In their montrances to the king on this occation, they obe and it to be a ge-Sourn, That nera. =-th if preCleerightvalendee to b farther, oven a the after ruin of the ancient liberty of the kingdom, and the fablects' right of property in their lands and goods. Though expressly fighteden by the king to touch his pretogative, they palled a bill abolithing these impodiens; which was rejected by the house of lords.

^{*} Winwood, vol. ii. p. 438.

IUIO.

Journ, 18th April, 5th and 10th May 1614, &c. Zoth February ings. See also in John-Davis's queltion con aming impositions, F 2 7, 128.

per John D. vis's que Clon concerning impolitions." hamm. 232.13ay 1610-

CHAP. XLVI

In another address to the king, they objected to the practice of borrowing upon privy seass, and defired that the subjects should not be forced to lend money to his majesty, nor give a reason for their refusal. Some murinurs likewise were thrown out in the house against a new monopoly of the licence of wines. It must be confessed, that forced loans and monopolics were established on many and ancient as well as recent precedents; though diametrically opposite to all the principles of a free government.

THE house likewise discovered some discontent against the king's proclemations. James told them, That though he weell knew, by the constitution and policy of the kongdom, that proclamations were not of equal force with laxest; yet be thought it a duty incumbert on him, and a power inseparably annexed to the errors, to refrain and prevent fuch mischiefs and inconveniences as he fare growing on the state, against which no certain law was extant, and which might tend to the great detriment of the fubject, if there should be no remedy provided till the meeting of a parliament. And this prerogative, he adds, our progenitors have, in ell times, ufed and enjoyed. The intervals between sessions, we may observe, were frequently fo long, as to render it necessary for a prince to interpole by his prerogative. The le-gality of this exertion was established by uniform and undisputed practice; and was even acknowledged by lawyers, who made, however, this difference between laws and proclamations, that the authority of the former was perpetual, that of the latter expired with the fovereign who emitted *them'. But what the authority could be, which bound the subject, yet was different from the authority of laws, and inferior to it, seems inexplicable Parliament. Hist. vol. v. p. 241.

E Sce note [F] at the end of the volume.

h Parliament. Hist. vol. v. p. 250.

Journ. 12th May 1624.

by any maxims of reason or politics: And in this CHAP. instance, as in many others, it is easy to see how inaccurate the English constitution was, before the parliament was enabled, by continued acquisitions or incroachments, to establish it on fixed principles of liberty. Upon the settlement of the reformation, that extensive branch of power, which regards ecclesiastical matters, being then without an owner, feemed to belong to the first occupant; and Henry VIII. failed not immediately to seize it, and to exert it even to the utmost degree of tyrainy. The possession of it was continued with Edward, and recovered by Elizabeth; and that ambitious princels was so remarkably jealous of this flower of her crown, that she severely reprimanded the parliament, if they ever prefuned to intermeddle in these matters; and they were fo overawed by her authority, as to submit, and to ask pardon on these occasions. But James's parliaments were much less obsequious. They ventured to lift up their eyes, and to confider this prerogative. They there faw a large province of government, possessed by the king alone, and scarcely ever communicated with the parliament. They were sensible that this province admitted not of an exact boundary or circumscription. They had selt that the Roman pontiss, in former ages, under pretence of religion, was gradually making advances to usurp the whole civil power. They dreaded still more dangerous consequences from the claims of their own fovereign, who refided among them, and who, m many other respects, possessed such unlimited authority. They therefore deemed it ablolutely necellary to circumscribe this branch of prerogative; and accordingly, in the preceding fession, they passed a bill against the cstablishment of any exclusiastical canons without confent of parliament's. But the k Journ. 2d, with December; 5th March 1606.

CH Chi house of lords, as is usual, defended the barriers of die throne, and rejected the bill.

In this fession, the commons, after passing anew the fame bill, made remonstrances against the procoolings of the high commission court. It required no great penetration to fee the entreme danger to liberty, arising in a regal government, from such large discretionary powers as were exercised by that court. But James refused compliance with the application of the commons. He was probably fenfible that, befides the dimination of his authority, many inconveniencies must necessarily result from the abolishing of all diferegionary power in every magistrate; and that the how, were they ever so carefully framed and digefied, coold not perfet provide against every contingency; much let a vincte they had not, as set, an inced a fulficient degree of accus racy and remonest.

Bur the being is which clarify occupied the commons during this tedion, was the abend of or was difflips and purveyance; prorequive which had he a more or leb touched en elect victory, disting the whole reign of James. In this above the coromons employed the proper areas a will have the entitle them to function. They once dathed ing a fettled revenue as an equivalent by the powers which he flould part with; and the kerg was willing to hearken to terms. And much adjute be agreed. to give up these pieroguines for 20 3000 pounds asyear, which they agreed to conter upon him". Λ nd

I Parliament. H. R. vol v. p. 247. Kennet, p. 681.

m V . Jeans from White add's Memoria, s, vol. n. p. 193, the reason this particular law. " Thom thence my lord treasurer affigued 46 came to the professord here he field, that the king would no more " rife at a falletike a merchant, That he would not have a flower of " his crown (morning the count of words) to much roll dig that it was " too dai by to be fish indied: And then he faid, that be mall deliver of the very eduptionen cand charift to fithe king's mind out of his es own hand writing: Which, before he rear, he faid he would ac-" quamt

And nothing remained, towards clofing the bargain, CHAP but that the commons should determine the funds XI.VI. by which this fum should be levied. This session 1410. was 100 far advanced to bring fo difficult a matter to a full conclusion; and though the parliament met again, towards the end of the year, and refumed the queition, they were never able to terminate an affair upon which they feemed fo intent. - he journals of that session are lest; and, as the historians of this reign are very negligent in relating parliamentary whirs, of whose importance they were not sufficlearly appriled, we know not exactly the reason of this failure. It only appears, that the king was tremely diffinished with the conduct of the parhowem, and foon after diffolved it. This was his "I parliament, and it fat near feven years.

Amount all these attacks, some more, some less siolent, on royal prerogative, the king displayed, as of only as ever, all his exulted notions of monarchy on the authority of princes. Even in a speech to the parliament, where he begged for supply, and where he should muturally have used every art to ineratiate himfelf with that affembly, he expressed in these terms: "I conclude, then," the " prior to eching the power of kings, with this " prion of divinity, that, as to dispute what God " room do, is blufphemy, but what Ged wills, that

[&]quot; quant us with a pile, art conceit of his majetty. As concerning the " sumber of muc, on thousand pounds, which was one vin bei, he could not fleet, because I me wir the number of the poets, who were alongs herous, though they lerved to many makes; and claim was " the comber or the apolities, when the remore Jodans we sawey; and therefore night belt he affected by his manuay? But their was a " mean number, which might accord us both; and that were time " Which, tays my lord treatmen, is a furred number, to lo many " was said's con mandments, which tend to viring any confication." If the new extrally voted twenty thouland pounds of your more, on Person of this preston center of the lang and the tentines, it was vertically the best paid wing for its goodness, that over was in the

C. H. A.P. " divines may lawfully and do ordinarily dispute XLVI. " and discuss; so is it sedition in subjects to dis-" pute what a king may do in the height of his 1610. " power. But just kings will ever be willing to " declare what they will do, if they will not incur " the curse of God. 'I will not be content, that " my power be disputed upon; but I shall ever be willing to make the reason appear of my "doings, and rule my actions according to my Notwithstanding the great extent of prerogative in that age, these expressions would probably give some offence. But we may observe, that, as the king's despotism was more speculative than practical, to the independency of the commons, was, at this time, the reverse; and though strongly supported by their present situation, as well as disposition, was too new and recent to be as yet founded on fystematical principles and opinions °.

3d May. Death of the French king.

This year was distinguished by a memorable event, which gave great alarm and concern in England; the murder of the French monarch by the poniard of the fanatical Ravaillac. With his death, the glory of the French monarchy suffered an eclipse for some years; and as that kingdom sell under an administration weak and bigoted, sactious and disorderly, the Austrian greatness began anew to appear formidable to Europe. In England, the antipathy to the catholics revived a little upon this tragical event; and some of the laws which had formerly been enacted, in order to keep these religionists in tawe, began now to be executed with greater rigour and severity.

THOUGH James's tunidity and indolence fixed him, during most of his reign, in a very prudent inatten-tion

n K. James's Works, p. 531.

of the volume.

P Kennet, p. 684.

1611.

tion to foreign affairs, there happened, this year, an CHAP. event in Europe of such mighty consequence as to rouse him from his lethargy, and summon up all his zeal and enterprise. A professor of divinity, named Vorsilius, the disciple of Arminius, was called from Arminian. a German to a Dutch university; and as he differed imfrom his Britannic majesty in some nice questions concerning the intimate essence and secret decrees of God, he was considered as a dangerous rival in scholastic fame, and was, at last, obliged to yield to the legions of that royal doctor, whose syllogisms he might have refuted or eluded. If vigour was wanting in other incidents of James's reign, here he behaved even with haughtiness and insolence; and the States were obliged, after several remonstrances, to deprive Vorstius of his chair, and to banish him their dominions. The king carried no farther his animosity against that professor; though he had very charitably hinted to the States, That, as to the burning of Vorslius for his blasphemics and atheism, he left ' them to their own Christian wisdom; but surely never beretie better deserved the flames. It is to be remarked, that at this period, all over Europe, except in Holland alone, the practice of burning heretics still prevailed, even in protestant countries; and instances were not wanting in England during the reign of lames.

To confider James in a more advantageous light, we must take a view of him as the legislator of Ireland; and most of the institutions, which he had framed for vivilizing that kingdom, being finished about this period, it may not here be improper to give some account of them. He frequently boasts of the management of Ireland as his master-piece; and it will appear, upon inquiry, that his vanity, in this particular, was not altogether without foundation.

Kennet, p. 725. m K. James's Whike, p. 355.

CHAP.
XLVI
1612.
State i Jichard.

AFTER the subjection of Ireland by Elizabeth, the more difficult task still remained; to civilize the inhabitants, to reconcile them to laws and industry, and to render their subjection durable and uteful to the crown of England. James proceeded to this work by a steady, regular, and well-concerted plan; and in the space of nine years, according to fir John Davis, he made greater advances towards the telorusation of that kingdom, that had been made in the four hundred and forty years which had clapsed fince the conquest was shift attempted.

In was previously needlary to abolish the Irith customs, which supplied the pare of laws, and which were calculated to keep that proper for ever in a state of barbarilm and dus reler.

By the Erelen law or cultom, every crime, here a ever enormous, was punished, not with death, but by a fine or pecuniary mulct, which was levied upon the criminal. Murder ittell, a among all the and cient barbarous nations, was atoned for in this manner; and each man, according to his rank, had a different rate or value affixed to him, a bigh if any one were willing to pay, he needed not fear affaffarating his enemy. This rate was called his cric. When fir William Fitzwilliams, being lord deputy, told-Magnire, that he was to fend a shealf into Fermannah, which, a little before, had been made a county, and fubjected to the English law; Tour sheriff, said Maguire, shall be welcome to me: But let me know, beforehand, his eric, or the price of his head, that, if my people cut it off, I may hery the money upon the county": As for oppression, extortion, and other trespasses, so little were they regarded, that no penalty was affixed to them, and no redress for such offences could ever be obtained.

THE customs of Gavelkinde and Tanistry were attended with the same abturdity in the distribution of property. The land, by the custom of Gavelkinde, C. J. A. was divided among all the males of the sept or the mily, both bastard and legitimate: And, after partition made, if any of the sept died, his portion we not shared out among his sons; but the chieftain, at his discretion, made a new partition of all the lands belonging to that sept, and gave every one his share?. As no man, by reason of this custom, enjoyed the sixed property of any land; to build, to plant, to enclose, to cultivate, to improve, would have been so much led! Libour.

· Sir John Davi , p. 166.

^{*} King James's Works, p. 259. edit. 1613.

Fine chickains and the tanists, though drawn from the principal families, were not hereditary, but were established by election, or, more properly iposting, by sorce and violence. Their authority was almost absolute; and, notwishstanding that certain lands were assigned to the office, its chief profit resulted from exactions, dues, assessments, for which there was no fixed law, and which were levied at pleasure. Hence arose that common bye-word enough the Irish, That they direct reestward of the laming the country where the English inhabitational which extended not beyond the compass of twenty miles, lying in the neighbourhood of wholim.

At the abolishing these Irish customs, and substituting English law in their place, James having taken all the natives under his protection, and declared them free citizens, proceeded to govern them by a regular administration, military as well as civil.

A small army was maintained, its discipline infected, and its pay transmitted from England, in order to keep the soldiers from proying upon the country, as had been usual in former reigns. When Odogartie raised an insurrection, a reinforcement

^c Sa John Davis, p. 167. S Id. p. 17 Td. p. 237.

CHAP. was fent over, and the flames of that rebellion were immediately extinguished.

¥612.

All minds being first quieted by a general indemnity, circuits were established, justice administered, oppression banished, and crimes and disorders of every kind severely punished. As the Irish had been universally engaged in the rebellion against Elizabeth, a resignation of all the rights, which had been formerly granted them to separate jurisdictions, was rigorously exacted; and no authority, but that of the king and the law, was permitted throughout the kingdom.

A RESIGNATION of all private estates was even required; and when they were restored, the proprietors received them under such conditions as might prevent, for the future, all tyranny and oppression over the common people. The value of the dues, which the nobles usually claimed from their vassals, was estimated at a fixed sum, and all farther arbitrary exactions prohibited under severe penalties.

The whole province of Ulster, having fallen into the crown by the attainder of rebels, a company was established in London, for planting new colonies in that fertile country: The property was divided into moderate shares, the largest not exceeding two thousand acres: Tenants were brought over from England and Scotland: The Irish were removed from the hills and fastnesses, and settled in the open country: Husbandry and the arts were taught them: A fixed habitation secured: Plunder and robbery punished: And, by these means, Ulster, from being the most wild and disorderly province of all Ireland, soon became the best sultivated and most civilized.

Such were the arts, by which James introduced humanity and justice among a people, who had ever

^{* 5}ir John Davis, p. 263.

* Id. p. 264, 265, &c.

* Id. p. 278.

* Id. p. 278.

* Id. p. 280.

been

been buried in the most prosound barbarism. No- CHAP. XLVI. ble cares! much superior to the vain and criminal glory of conquests; but requiring ages of perseverance and attention to perfect what had been so happily begun.

A LAUDABLE act of justice was, about this time, executed in England upon lord Sanquhir, a Scottish nobleman, who had been guilty of the base assafination of Turner, a fencing-master. The English nation, who were generally distatisfied with the Scots, were enraged at this crime, equally mean and atrocious; but James appealed them, by preferring the severity of law to the intercession of the friends and family of the criminal.

* Kennet, p. 688.

C H A P. XLVII.

Death of prince Henry—Marriage of the prince Elizabeth with the Palatine—Rife of Somerfee — His marriage—Overbury poisoned—Itali of Somerfee—Rife of Buckingham—Cautionary towns delivered—Affairs of Scotland.

r612.
Nov. 6th.
Peath of punc

of Wales, dilliged an universal grief throughout the nation. Though youth and royal birth, both of them throng allurements, prepoffels men mightily in favour of the carly age of princes; it is with peculiar fondacts that hilterians mention Henry: And in every respect, his merit feems to have been entracrumant. He had not reached his eighteenth year, and he already possessed more dignity in his behaviour, and commanded more respect, than his Lather, with all his age, learning, and experience. Reither his high fortune, nor his youth, had feduced time into any irregular pleafures: Bufiness and am-Lition feem to have been his fole passion. His inclinations, as well as exercises, were martial. The French ambaffador, taking leave of him, and afking his commands for France, found him employed in the exercise of the pike; Tell your king, said he, in rubat occupation you left me engaged. He had conreived great affection and effect for the brave fir Walter Raleigh. It was his faying, Sure no king but my father resuld keep fuch a bird in a cage b. He

" Cole': Deteflich, p. 37.

The French rymarch had given, particular orders to his ministers as cultivate to epimer's mending; who must foon, said he, have chief suchonity in largeaned, where the king and queen are held in so little estimation. See Dept. de la Boderie, vol. i. p. 402. 415. vol. ii p. 16.

feems indeed to have nourished too violent a con- CHAP. tempt for the king on account of his pedantry and pufill abouty; and by that means flruck in with the reflictioned coartal spirit of the English nation. Had he in ed. Le had probably promoted the glory, perhave not the felicity, of his people. The unhappy preputation, which man commonly, entertain in lavour of amphion, courage, enterprise, and other warld a detues, conjugas generous natures, who always in the tame, but but but purfuits as defiroy their own pears, and that of the fell of mankind.

Violated reports were propagated, as if Henry had been enerted off by margin; out the phylicians, on openous like body, round we is unforme to confirm tech as epiation. The bold and criminal malignity of men's stropped and persed frered not even the Lag on the occil no But that prince's tharacter forces rather to have talled in the extreme of facility and humarias, than in the of crucky and violence. The buildgence to Herry van great, and perhaps in pradent, by giving line a large and independent ictiles cut, even in so early youth.

The marriage of the princess Elimbeth, with Frederic, elector palatine, was iniffied fome sime after the death of the prince, and ferved to diffipate the grief which arose on that inclancholy event. But this marriage, though celebrated with great jey and festivity, proved, itself, an unhappy event to the Manage king, as well as to his fon-in-law, and had ill consequences on the reputation and fortunes of both. Elizabeth The elector, trusting to so great an alliance, en- with the gaged in enterpriles beyond his flrength: And the pulatine. king, not being able to support him in his distress, loft entirely, in the end of his life, what remained of: the affection and efteem of his own fubjects.

EXCEPT during fessions of parliament, the history of this reign may more properly be called the history 1612.

XLVII.

16:00

of the

Kennet, p. 690. Coke, p. 37. Welwood, p. 272.

XLVII. x613. Rife of Somerfet.

CHAP, of the court than that of the nation. An interesting object had, for some years, engaged the attention of the court:. It was a favourite, and one beloved by James with so profuse and unlimited an affection; as left no room for any rival or competitor. the end of the year 1659, Robert Carre, a youth of twenty years of age, and of a good family in Scotland, arrived in London, after having passed some time in his travels. All his natural accomplishments confifted in good looks: All his acquired abilities, in an easy air and graceful demeanour. He had letters or recommendation to his countryman lord Hay; and that nobleman no fooner cast his eye upon him, than he discovered talent; sussicient to entitle him immediately to make a great figure in the government. Apprised of the king's pussion for youth and beauty, and exterior appearance, he fludied how matters might be so managed that this new object thould make the throngest impression upon him. Without mentioning him at court, he assigned him the office, at a match at tilting, of presenting to the' king his buckler and device; and hoped that he would attract the attention of the monarch. Fortune proved favourable to his defign, by an incident which bore at tirst a contrary aspect. When Carre was advancing to execute his office, his unruly horfe thing him, and broke his leg in the king's presence. James approached him with pity and concern: Love and affection arose on the fight of his beauty and tender years; and the prince ordered him immediately to be lodged in the palace, and to be carefully attended. He himself, after the tilting, paid him a visit in his chamber, and frequently returned during his confinement. The agnorance and fimplicity of the boy finished the conquest, begun by his exterior graces and accomplishments. Other princes have been fond of choosing their favourites from among the lower ranks of their subjects, and have reposed themselves on them with the more unreferved served confidence and affection, because the object CHAP. has been beholden to their bounty for every honour and acquisition: James was desirous that his favourite should also derive from him all his sense, experience, and knowledge. Highly conceited of his own wifdom, he pleated himself with the fancy that this raw youth, by his lessons and instructions, would, in a little time, be equal to his fagest ministers, and be initiated into all the profound mysteries of government, on which he set so high a value. And as this kind of creation was more perfectly his own work than any other, he feems to have indulged an unlimited fondness for his minion, beyond even that which he bore to his own children. He foon knighted him, created him viscount Rochester, gave him the garter, brought him into the privy council, and though, at first, without alligning him any particular office, bestowed on him the supreme direction of all his business and political concerns. Agreeable to this rapid advancement in confidence and honour, were the riches heaped upon the needy favourite; and while Salisbury and all the wisest ministers could scarcely find expedients sufficient to keep in motion the overburthened machine of government, James, with unsparing hand, loaded with treafures this infignificant and ufeless pageant d.

1613.

IT is faid, that the king found his pupil so ill educated, as to be ignorant even of the lowest rudiments of the Latin tongue; and that the monarch, laying aside the sceptre, took the birch into his royal hand, and instructed him in the principles of gram-During the intervals of this noble occupation, affairs of state would be introduced; and the stripling, by the ascendant which he had acquired, was now enabled to repay in political, what he had received in grammatical, instruction. Such scenes and such incidents are the more ridiculous, though the

d Kennet, p. 685, 686, &c. Tot. VI

 $XL^{V}\Pi_{*}$

CHAP. Jess odious, as the passion of James seems not to have contained in it any thing criminal or flagitious. History charges herself willingly with a relation of the great crimes, and fill more with that of the great virtues of nankind; but the appears to fall from her dignity, when necessitated to dwell on such frivolous events and ignoble perforages.

The favourite was not, at first, so intoxicated with advancement, as not to be sensible of his own ignorance and inexperience. He had recourse to the affiltance and advice of a friend; and he was more fortunate in his choice, than is usual with fuch pampered minions. In fir Thomas Overbury he met with a judicious and fincere counsellor, who, building all hopes of his own preferment on that of the young favourite, endcavoured to inflil into him the principles of prudence and diferction. By zealoufly ferving every body, Carre was taught to abate the envy which might attend his fudden elevation: By showing a preference for the English, he learned to eleape the prejudices which prevailed against his country. And so long as he was content to be ruled by Overbury's friendly councils, he enjoyed, what is gare, the highest favour of the prince, without being hated by the people.

To complete the meature of courtly happiness, nought was wanting but a kind militelis; and, where high fortune-concurred with all the graces of youth and beauty, this circumstance could not be difficult to attain. But it was here that the favourite met with that rock on which all his fortunes were wrecked, and which plunged him for ever into an abyss of infamy, guilt, and misery.

No fooner had James mounted the throne of England, than he remembered his friendship for the unfortunate families of Howard and Devereux, who had fuffered for their attachment to the cause of Mary and to his own. Having restored young Essex to his blood and dignity, and conferred the titles of 1613.

Suffolk and Northampton on two brothers of the CHAP. house of Norfolk, he sought the farther pleasure of uniting these families by the marriage of the earl of Effex with lady Frances Howard, daughter of the earl of Suffolk. She was only thirteen, he fourteen years of age; and it was thought proper, till both thould attain the age of pliberty, that he should go abroad and pass some time in his travels. He returned into England after four-years absence, and was pleased to find his counters in the full lustre of beauty, and possessed of the love and admiration of the whole court. But, when the earl approached and claimed the privileges of a husband, he met with nothing but fyraptoms of aversion and disgust, and a that refusal of any farther familiarities. He applied to her parents, who constrained her to attend him into the country, and to partake of his bed: But nothing could overcome her rigid fullenness and obtlinacy; and she still rose from his side, without having shared the nuptial pleasures. Disgusted with reiterated denials, he at last gave over the pursuit, and separating himself from her, thenceforth abandoned her conduct to her own will and discretion.

Such coldness and aversion in lady Essex arose not without an attachment to another object. The favourite had opened his addresses, and had been too successful in making impression on the tender heart of the young counters. She imagined that, so long as the refused the embraces of Essex, she never could be deemed his wife; and that a separation and divorce might still open the way for a new marriage with her beloved Rochester 5. Thought their passion was so violent, and their opportunities of intercourse to frequent, that they had already indulged themfelves in all the gratifications of love, they still lamented their unhappy fate, while the union between [^] Kennet, p. 696. f. Idem, p. 637.

⁸ Sign Trials, vol. i. p. 228.

CHAP. them was not entire and indiffoluble. And the lover, as well as his mistress, was impatient, till their mutual and and are the lover.

1613. tual ardour iliquid be crowned by marriage.

So momentous an affair could not be concluded without confulting Overbury, with whom Rochester was accustomed to share all his secrets. While that faithful friend had confidered his patron's attachment to the countess-of Essex merely as an assair of gallantry, he had favoured its progress; and it was partly owing to the ingenious and passionate letters which he dictated, that Rochester had met with fuch fuccess in his addresses. Like an experienced courtier, he thought that a conquest of this nature would throw a lustre on the young favourite, and would tend still farther to endear him to James, who was charmed to hear of the amours of his court, and listened with attention to every tale of gallantry. But great was Overbury's alarm, when Rochester mentioned his design of marrying the countess; and he used every method to disluade his friend from so foolish an attempt.' He represented how invidious, how difficult an enterprise to procure her a divorce from her husband: How dangerous, how shameful, to take into his own bed a prosligate woman, who, being married to a young nobleman or the first rank, had not scrupled to prostitute her character, and to bestow favours on the object of a capricous and momentary passion. And, in the zeal of friendship, he went to far as to threaten Rochester, that he would separate himself for ever from him, if he could so far forget his konour and his interest as to prosecute the intended marriage h.

ROCHESTER had the weakness to reveal this conversation to the countels of Essex; and when her rage and sury broke out against Overbury, he had also the weakness to enter into her vindictive projects, and to swear vengeance against his friend, for CHAP. the utmost instance which he could receive of his faithful friendship. Some contrivance was necessary for the execution of their purpose. Rochester addressed himself to the king, and after complaining, that his own indulgence to Overbury had begotten in him a degree of arrogance, which was extremely disagreeable, he procured a commission for his embassy to Russia; which he represented as a retreat for his friend, both profitable and honourable. When confulted by Overbury, he earnestly disfuaded him from accepting this offer, and took on himfelf the office of fatisfying the king, if he should be anywise displeased with the refusal. To the king again he aggravated the infolence of Overbury's conduct, and obtained a warrant for committing him to the April and. Tower, which James intended as a flight punishment for his disobedience. The lieutenant of the Tower was a creature of Rochester's, and had lately been put into the office for this very purpose: He confined Overbury fo strictly, that the unhappy prisoner was debarred the sight even of his nearest relations; and no communication of any kind was allowed with him, during near fix months which he lived in prison.

^{*} State Trials, vol. i. p. 235, 236. 252. Franklyn, p. 14.
5. " ... jects.

Tims obstacle being removed, the lovers pursued their purpose; and the king himself, forgetting the dignity of his character, and his friendship for the family of Essex, entered zealously into the project of procuring the counters a divorce from her hufband. Effex also embraced the opportunity of separating himself from a bad woman, by whom he was hated; and he was willing to favour their fuccess by any honourable expedient. The pretence for a divorce was his incapacity to fulfil the conjugal duties; and he confessed, that, with regard to the countefs, he was conscious of such an infirmity, i State Trials, vol. i. p. 235, 237, &c.

though

1613.

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

XLVII. 1613.

CHAP though he was not fensible of it with regard to any other woman. In her place too, i. is faid, a young virgin was substituted under a mast, to undergo a legal inspection by a jury of matrons. fuch a trial, seconded by court-insluence, and supported by the ridiculous opinion of fascination or witchcraft, the sentence of divorce was pronounced between the earl of Essex and his countess k. And, to crown the scene, the king, solicitous lest the lady should lose any rank by her new marriage, bestowed on his minion the title of earl of Somerfet.

Notwithstanding this fuccess, the countess of Somerfet was not fatisfied, till the should farther fa-tiate her revenge on Overbufy; and she engaged ther hulband, as well as her uncle, the earl of Northampton, in the atrocious design of taking him off fecretly by poison. Fruitless attempts were reiterated by weak poisons; but, at last, they gave him one so fudden and violent, that the symptoms were apparent to every one who approached him '. His interment was hurried on with the greatest precipitation; and though a strong suspicion immediately prevailed in the public, the full proof of the crime was not brought to light till some years after.

THE fatal catalirophe of Overbury increased or beget the suspicion, that the prince of Wales had been carried off by poison, given him by Somerset. Men confidered not, that the contrary inference was much juster. If Somerset was so great a novice in this detestable art, that, during the course of five months, a man who was his prisoner, and attended by none but his emissaries, could not be dispatched but in so bungling a manner; how could it be imagined that a young prince, living in his own court, furrounded by his own friends and domestics, could

1 Kennet, p. 693. State Trials, vol. i. p.,233, 234, &t

Overbury po foned. x6th Sept, k State Trials, vol. i. p. 223, 224, &c. Franklyn's Annals, p. 2, be exposed to Somerset's attempts, and be taken off CHAP by so subtle a poison, if such a one exist, as could clude the skill of the most experienced physicians?

28

XLVII.

1677.

THE ablest minister that James ever possessed, the carl of Salilbury, was dead ": Suffolk, a man of flender capacity, had succeeded him in his office: And it was now his task to supply, from an exhausted treasury, the profusion of James and of his young favourite. The title of baronet, invented by Salitbury, was fold; and two hundred patents of that species of knighthood were disposed of for so many thousand pounds: Each rank of nobility had also its price affixed to it ": Privy feals were circulated to the amount of two hundred thousand pounds: Benevolences were exacted to the amount of fifty-two thoufand pounds . And some monopolies of no great value were erected. But all these expedients proved insufficient to supply the king's necessities; even though he began to enter into some schemes for retrenching his expences. However small the hopes of fuccess, a new parliament must be summoned, and this dangerous expedient, for fuch it was now become, once more be put to trial.

WHEN the commons were affembled, they difcovered an extraordinary alarm, on account of the 5th April. rumour which was spread abroad concerning under- ment. takers 4. It was reported, that feveral persons, attached to the king, had entered into a confederacy; and having laid a regular plan for the new elections, had distributed their interest all over England, and had undertaken to fecure a majority for the court. So ignorant were the commons, that they knew not this incident to be the first infallible symptom of any regular or established liberty. Had they been con-

1614.

m 14'h of May 1612. ⁹ Idem, p. 10.

n Franklyn, p. 11. 33.

P Idem, p. 49.

⁹ Parham. Hist. vol. v. p 286. Kennet, p. 696. Jouin, 12 April, 2d May 1614, &cc. Franklyr, p. 48.

CHAP tented to follow the maxims of their predecessors, who, as the earl of Salisbury said to the last parliament, never, but thrice in fix hundred years, refused a supply'; they needed not dread that the crown should ever interest itself in their elections. Formerly the kings even insisted, that none of their household should be elected members; and though the charter was afterwards declated void, Henry VI. from his great favour to the city of York, conferred a peculiar privilege on its citizens, that they should be exempted from this trouble. It is well known, that, in ancient times, a feat in the house being considered as a burthen, attended neither with honour nor profit, it was requifite for the counties and boroughs to pay fees to their representatives. About this time a feat began to be regarded as an honour, and the countrygentlemen contended for it; though the practice of levying wages for the parliament-men was not altogether discontinued. It was not till long after, when liberty was thoroughly established, and popular assemblies entered into every branch of public business, that the members began to join profit to honour, and the crown found it necessary to distribute among them all the confiderable offices of the kingdom.

> So little skill or so small means had the courtiers, in James's reign, for managing elections, that this house of commons shewed rather a stronger spirit of liberty than the foregoing; and instead of entering upon the business of supply, as urged by the king, who made them several liberal offers of grace', they Journ. 17 Feb. 1609. It appears, however, that Salisbury was somewhat millaken in this fact: And if the kings were not often re-. fused supply by the parliament, it was only because they would not . often expose themselves to the hazard of being refused: But it is certain that English parliaments did anciently carry their frugality to an extreme, and feldom could be prevailed upon to give the necessary support to government.

⁵ Coke's Institutes, part 4. chap. i. of Charters of Exemption.

¹ Journ. 11 April 1614.

inmediately refumed the subject which had been CHAP-opened last parliament, and disputed his majesty's power of levying new customs and impositions, by the more authority of his prerogative. It is remarkable that, in their debates on this subject, the courtiers frequently pleaded, as a precedent, the example of all the other hereditary monarchs in Europe, and particularly mentioned the kings of France and Spain; nor was this reasoning received by the house either with furprise or indignation 4. The members of the opposite party either contented themselves with denying the justness of the inference, or they disputed the truth of the observation. And a patriot member in particular, sir Roger Owen, even in arguing against the impositions, frankly allowed, that the king of England was endowed with as ample power and prerogative as any prince.in Christendom y. The nations on the continent, we may observe, enjoyed still, in that age, some small remains of liberty; and the English were possessed oi little more.

THE commons eapplied to the lords for a conference with regard to the new impositions. A speech of Neile, bishop of Lincoln, reslecting on the lower houle, begat some altercation with the peers 2; and the king seized the opportunity of dissolving, im- 6th June. mediately, with great indignation, a parliament which had shewn so sirm a resolution of retrenching his prerogative, without communicating, in return, the smallest supply to his necessities. He carried his resentment so far as even to throw into prison some of the members, who had been the most forward in their opposition to his measures. In vain did he plead, in excuse for his violence, the example of Elizabeth and other princes of the line of Tudor, as well as Plantagenet. The people and the parliament,

× Journ. 12, 21 May 1614. u Journ 21 May 1614. 2 See note [H] at the end of the y Jearn. 18 April 1614. volume. Rennet, p. 696.

. 1614.

CHAP. liament, without abandoning for ever all their liberties and privileges, could acquiesce in none of these precedents, how ancient and frequent soever. And were the authority of such precedents admitted, the utmost that could be inferred is, that the constitution of England was, at that time, an inconsistent fabric, whose jarring and discordant parts must soon destroy each other, and from the dissolution of the old, beget some new form of civil government more uniform and confistent.

> In the public and avowed conduct of the king and the house of commons, throughout this whole reign, there appears sufficient cause of quarrel and mutual disgust; yet are we not to imagine, that this was . the fole foundation of that jealousy which prevailed between them. During debates in the house, it often happened, that a particular member, more ardent and zealous than the rest, would display the highest sentiments of liberty, which the commons contented themselves to hear with silence and seeming approbation; and the king, informed of thefe' harangues, concluded the whole bouse to be insected with the fame principles, and to be engaged in a combination against his prerogative. The king, on the other hand, though he valued himself extremely on his king-craft, and perhaps was not altogether incapable of dissimulation, seems to have been very little endowed with the gift of secrecy; but openly at his table, in all companies, inculcated those monarchical tenets which he had so strongly imbibed. Before a numerous audience, he had expressed himself with great disparagement of the common law of England, and had given the preference, in the itrongest terms, to the civil law: And for this indiscretion he found himself obliged to apologise, in a speech to the former parliament b. As a specimen of his usual liberty of talk, we may mention a story, shough it passed some time after, which we meet CHAP. with in the life of Waller, and which that poet used frequently to repeat. When Waller was young, he had the curiofity to go to court; and he stood in the circle, and faw James dine; where, among other company, there fat at table two bishops, Neile and Andrews. The king proposed aloud this question, Whether he might not take his subject's money when he needed it, without all this formality of parliament? Neile replied, God forbid you should not: For you are the breath of our nostrils. Andrews declined answering, and said, he was not skilled in parliamentary cases: But upon the king's urging him, and faying he would admit of no evasion, the bishop replied pleasantly, Why then I think your majesty may lawfully take my brother Neile's money :. For he offers it .

2514-

Bomer let's

The favourite had hitherto escaped the inquiry of justice; but he had not escaped that still voice which can make itself be heard amidst all the hurry and flattery of a court, and astonishes the criminal with a just representation of his most secret enormities. Conscious of the murder of his friend, Somerset received small consolation from the enjoyments of love, or the utmost kindness and indulgence of his fovereign. The graces of his youth gradually disappeared, the gaiety of his manners was obscured, his politeness and obliging behaviour were changed into fullenness and filence. And the king, whose affections had been engaged by these superficial accomplishments, began to estrange himself from a man who no longer contributed to his amusement.

THE sagacious courtiers observed the first symptoms of this disgust: Somerset's enemies seized the opportunity, and offered a new minion to the king. George Villiers, a youth of one-and-twenty, younger 1615.

CHAP. brother of a good family, returned at this time from his travels, and was remarked for the advantages of a handsome person, genteel air, and fashionable apparel. At a comedy he was purposely placed full in James's eye, and immediately engaged the attention, and, in the same instant, the affections of that monarch. Ashanied of his sudden attachment, the king endeavoured, but in vain, to conceal the partiality which he felt for the handsome stranger; and he employed all his profound politics to fix him in his service, without seeming to desire He declared his resolution not to confer any office on him, unless entreated by the queen; and he pretended, that it should only be in complaisance to her choice he would agree to admit him near his The queen was immediately applied to; but she, well knowing the extreme to which the king carried these attachments, refused, at first, to lend her countenance to this new passion. It was not till intreated by Abbot archbishop of Canterbury, a decent prelate, and one much prejudiced against Somerset, that she would condescend to oblige her husband, by asking this favour of him . And the king, thinking now that all appearances were fully faved, no longer constrained his affection, but immediately bestowed the office of cup-bearer on young Villiers.

THE whole court was thrown into parties between the two minions; while some endeavoured to advance the rising fortune of Villiers, others decmed it safer to adhere to the established credit of So-The king himself, divided between inmerset. clination and decorum, increased the doubt and ambiguity of the courtiers; and the stern jealousy of the old favourite, who refused every advance of friendship from his rival, begat perpetual quarrels between their several partisans. But the discovery of Somerset's guilt in the murder of Overbury, at CHAP last decided the controversy, and exposed him to the ruin and infamy which he so well merited.

d Franklyn, p. 50. Kennet, vol. ii. p. 693. c Coke, p. 46, 47. Rush, vol. i. p. 456.

An apothecary's 'prentice, who had been employed in making up the poilons, having retired to Flushing, began to talk very freely of the whole fecret; and the assair at task came to the ears of Trumbal, the king's envoy in the Low Countries. By his means, sir Ralph Winwood, secretary of state, was informed, and he immediately carried the intelligence to James. The king, alarmed and altonished to find such enormous guilt in a man whom he had admitted into his bosom, sent for fir Edward Coke, chief justice, and earnestly recommended to him the most rigorous and unbiassed scrutiny. This injunction was executed with great indulary and severity: The whole labyrinth of guilt was carefully unravelled: The lesser criminals, sir Jervis Elvis, lieutenant of the Tower, Franklin, Weston, Mrs. Turner, were first tried and condemned: Somerset and his countess were afterwards found guilty: Northampton's death, a little before, had faved him from a like fate.

IT may not be unworthy of remark, that Coke, in the trial of Mrs. Turner, told her that she was guilty of the seven deadly sins: She was a whore, a bawd, a sorcerer, a witch, a papist, a selon, and a murderer. And what may more surprise us, Bacon, then attorney-general, took care to observe, that possoning was a popish trick. Such were the bigoted prejudices which prevailed: Possoning was not, of itself, sufficiently edious, if it were not represented as a branch of popery. Stowe tells us, that when the king came to Newcastle, on his first entry into England, he gave liberty to all the prisoners, except those who were confined for treason, murder, and papistry. When one considers these State Trials, vol. i. p. 230.

Ibid. vol. | p. 242.

CHAP. circumstances, that furious bigotry of the catholics which broke out in the Gunpowder conspiracy, appears the less surprising.

THE THE

All the accomplices in Overbury's murder received the punishment due to their crime: But the king bestowed a pardon on the principals, Somerset and the countels. It must be confessed, that James's fortitude had been highly laudable, had he persisted in his first intention of consigning over to severe justice all the criminals: But let us still beware of blaming him too harshly, if, on the approach of the fatal hour, he scrupled to deliver into the hands of the executioner, persons whom he had once favoured with his most tender affections. To soften the rigour of their fate, after some years imprisonment, he restored them to their liberty, and conferred on them a pension, with which they retired, and languished out old age in infamy and obscurity. Their guilty loves were turned into the most deadly hatred; and they passed many years together in the same house, without any intercourse or correspondence with each other h.

SEVERAL historians i, in relating these events, have insisted much on the dissimulation of James's behaviour, when he delivered Somerset into the hands of the chief justice; on the insolent menaces of that criminal; on his peremptory resulate to stand a trial; and on the extreme auxiety of the king during the whole progress of this affair. Allowing all these circumstances to be true, of which some are suspicious, if not palpably false k, the great remains of tenderness which James still felt for Somerset may, perhaps, be sufficient to account for them. That favourite was sigh-spirited, and resolute rather to perish, than live under the insamy to which he was exposed. James was sensible that the pardoning of so great a criminal, which was of CHAP. ittelf invidious, would become still more unpopular, XLV if his obstinate and stubborn behaviour on his trial should augment the public hatred against him '. At least, the unreserved confidence in which the king had indulged his favourite for several years, might render Somerset naîter of so many secrets, that it is impossible, without farther light, to assign the particular reason of that superiority, which, it is faid, he appeared so much to assume.

Brit. article Coke, p. 1384.

THE fall of Somerset, and his banishment from Rice of court, opened the way for Villiers to mount up at Buckingonce to the full height of favour, of honours, and of riches. Had James's passion been governed by common rules of prudence, the office of cup-bearer would have attached Villiers to his person, and might well have contented one of his age and family; nor would any one, who was not cynically austere, have much censured the singularity of the king's choice in his friends and favourites. But fuch advancement was far inferior to the fortune. which he intended for his minion. In the course of a few years he created him viscount Villiers, earl, marquis, and duke of Buckingham, knight of the garter, master of the horse, chief justice in eyre, warden of the cinque ports, master of the king's-bench office, steward of Westminster, constable of Windsor, and lord high admiral of England^m. His mother obtained the title of countels of Buckingham: His brother was created viscount Purbeck; and a numerous train of needy relations were all pushed up into credit and authority. And thus the found prince, while he meant to play the tutor to his favourite, and to train him up in the rules of prudence and politics, took, an infallible method, by loading him with premature and exorbitant ho-m Franklyn, p. 30. Clarendon,

Bacon, vol. iv. 617. 8vo. edit. vol. i. p. 10.,

CHAP. nours, to render him, for ever, rash, precipitate, and XLVII. infolent, 2615.

A young minion to gratify with pleasure, a necessitous samily to supply with riches, were enterprifes too great for the empty exchequer of James. In order to obtain a little money, the cautionary towns must be delivered up to the Dutch; a meafure which has been severely blamed by almost all historians; and I may venture to affirm, that it has been censured much beyond its real weight and importance.

WHEN queen Elizabeth advanced money for the support of the infant republic, besides the view of securing herself against the power and ambition of Spain, the still reserved the prospect of reimbursement; and she got consigned into her hands the three important fortresses of Flushing, the Brille, and Rammekins, as pledges for the money due to her. Indulgent to the necessitous condition of the States, she agreed that the debt should bear no interest; and she stipulated, that if ever England should make a separate peace with Spain, she should pay the troops which garrisoned those fortresses ".

Cavionary towns delivered.

> AFTER the truce was concluded between Spain and the United Provinces, the States made an agreement with the king, that the debt, which then amounted to 800,000 pounds, should be discharged by yearly payments of 40,000 pounds; and as five years had elapsed, the debt was now reduced to 600,000 pounds; and in fifteen years more, if the truce were renewed, it would be finally extinguished., But of this sum, 26,000 pounds a-year were expended on the pay of the garrisons: The remainder alone accrued to the king: And the n Rymer, tom. xvi. p. 341. Winwood, vol. ik. p. 352.

Sir Dudley Carleton's betters, p. 27, 28.

Stotes, weighing these circumstances, thought, that CHAP. they made James a very advantageous offer, when XLVII. they expressed their willingness, on the surrender of the cantionary towns, to pay him immediately 250,000 pounds, and to incorporate the English garrifons in their army. It, occurred also to the Ling, that even the payment of the 40,000 pounds a-year was precarious, and depended on the accident that the truce should be renewed between Spain and the republic: If war broke out, the maintenance of the garrisons lay upon England alone; a burthen very ufeless, and too heavy for the slender revenues of that kingdom: That even during the truce, the Dutch, Braitened by other expences, were far from being regular in their payments; and the garrisons were at present in danger of mutinging for want of jublishence: That the annual fum of 14,000 pounds, the whole faving on the Dutch payments, amounted, in fifteen years, to no more than 210,000 pounds; whereas 250,000 pounds were offered immediately, a larger fum, and if money be computed at ten per cent, the current interest, more than double the fum to which England was entitled ": That if James waited till the whole delet were discharged, the troops, which composed the garrisons, remained a burthen upon him, and could not be broken, without receiving some consideration for their past services: That the cautionary towns were only a temporary restraint upon the Hollanders; and in the present emergence, the conjunction of interest between England and the republic was so intimate as to render all other ties supershous; and no reasonable meafures for mutual support would be wanting from

Vol. VI.

An annuity of 14,000 pounds during fifteen years, money being at 10 per cent, is worth on computation only 206,500 pounds, whereas the king teceived 250,000. Yet the bargain was good for the Dutch, as well as the king, because they were both of them freed from the maintenance of useless garrifons.

XLVII. 1616.

CHAP, the Dutch, even though freed from the dependence of these garrisons: That the exchequer of the republic was at present very low, insormed that they found difficulty, now that the aids of France were withdrawn, to maintain themselves in that posture of defence which was requisite during the truce with Spain: And that the Spaniards were perpetually insisting with the king on the restitution of these towns, as belonging to their crown; and no cordial alliance could ever be made with that nation, while they remained in the hands of the English 4. These reasons, together with his urgent wants, induced the king to accept of Caron's offer; and he evacuated the cautionary towns, which held the States in a degree of fubjection, and which an ambitious and enterprifing prince would have regarded as his most valuable possessions. the date of the full liberty of the Dutch commonwealth.

6th June.

7617. .Affairs of Scottand.

WHEN the crown of England devolved on James, it might have been foreseen by the Scottish nation, that the independence of their kingdom, the object for which their ancestors had shed so much blood, would now be lost; and that, it both states persevered in maintaining separate laws and parliaments, the weaker would more fenfibly feel the subjection, than if it had been totally subdued by force of arms. But these views did not generally occur. The glory of having given a fovereign to their powerful enemy, the advantages of present peace and tranquillity, the riches acquired from the munificence of their master; these considerations secured their dutiful obedience to a prince, who daily gave fuch fensible proofs of his friendship and partiality towards them. Never had the authority of any king, who refided among them, been to absent; and as the administration had been hitherto conducted with great order and tranquillity, there had happened no occurrence to draws thither our attention. But this summer, the king was resolved to pay a visit to his native country, in order to renew his ancient friendships and connections, and to introduce that change of ecclesiastical discipline and government, on which he was extremely intent. The three chief points of this kind, which James proposed to accomplish by his journey to Scotland, were, the enlarging of episcopal authority, the establishing of a few ceremonics in public worship, and the fixing of a superiority in the civil above the ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

Bur it is an observation suggested by all history, and by none more than by that of James and his successor, that the religious spirit, when it mingles with faction, contains in it something supernatural and unaccountable; and that, in its operations upon society, essects correspond less to their known causes than is found in any other circumstance of government. A reslection which may, at once, assord a source of blame against such sovereigns as lightly innovate in so dangerous an article, and of apology for such, as being engaged in an enterprise of that nature, are disappointed of the expected event, and fail in their undertakings.

When the Scottish nation was first seized with that zeal for reformation, which, though it caused such disturbance during the time, has proved so salutary in the consequences; the preachers, assuming a character little inferior to the prophetic or apostolical, distained all subjection to the spiritual rulers of the church, by whom their innovations were punished and opposed. The revenues of the dignified clergy, no longer considered as sacred, were either appropriated by the present possessors,

 \mathbf{G} 2

TC

CHAP, or feized by the more powerful barons; and what remained, after mighty dilapidations, was, by act of parliament, annexed to the crown. The pre-lates however, and abbots, maintained their temporal jurisdictions and their seats in parliament; ... and though laymen were fometimes endowed with ecclesiastical titles, the church, notwithstanding its frequent protestations to the contrary, was still supposed to be represented by those spiritual lords, in the flates of the kingdom. After many struggles the king, even before his accession to the throne of England, had acquired fusficient influence over the Scottish clergy, to catort from them an acknowledgment of the parliamemary jurisdiction of bishops; though attended with many precautions, in order to fecure themselves against the spiritual encroachments of that order. When king of England, he engaged them, though still with great reluctance on their part, to advance a step farther, and to receive the bishops as perpetual presidents or moderators in their ecclesiastical synods; reiterating their protestations against all spiritual jurisdiction of the prelates, and all controlling power over the prefbyters . And by fuch gradual innovations, the king flattered himself, that he should quietly introduce episcopal authority: But as his final scope was fully seen from the beginning, every new advance gave fresh occasion of discontent, and aggravated, instead of softening, the abhorrence entertained against the prelacy.

> WHAT rendered the king's aim more apparent were, the endeavours which, at the same time, he used to introduce into Scotland some of the ceremonies of the church of England: The rest, it was eafily foreseen, would foon follow. The fire of devotion, excited by novelty, and inflamed by opposition, had so possessed the minds of the Scottish CHAP. reformers, that ail rites and ornaments, and even XIVII. order of worthip, were disdainfully rejected as use-Lis burthens; retarding the imagination in its rapturous ecstasies, and cramping the operations of that divine spirit, by which they supposed themsolves to be animated. A mode of worship was citablished, the most naked and most simple imaginable; one that borrowed nothing from the tentes; but reposed itself entirely on the contemplation of that divine essence, which discovers itself to the understanding only. This species of devotion, so worthy of the Supreme Being, but so lettle fuitable to human frailty, was observed to occasion great disturbances in the breast, and in many respects to consound all rational principles of conduct and behaviour. The mind, straining for these extraordinary raptures, reaching them by thort glances, finking again under its own weakmels, rejecting all exterior aid of pomp and ceremony, was to occupied in this inward life, that # fled from every intercourfe of fociety, and from every cheerful amusement, which could soften or humanise the character. It was obvious to all differning eyes, and had not escaped the king's, that, by the prevalence of fanaticism, a gloomy and sullen disposition established itself among the people; a spirit, obstinate and dangerous; independent and diforderly; animated equally with a contempt of authority, and a hatred to every other mode of religion, particularly to the antholic. In order to mellow these humours, James endeavoured to infuse a small tincture of ceremony into the national worship, and to introduce such rites as might, in some degree, occupy the mind, and Please the senses, without departing too far from that simplicity, by which the reformation was diftinguished. The finer arts top, though still rude in these northern kingdoms, were employed to adorn \mathbf{G}_{3}

XLVII. 1617.

CII A P. adorn the churches; and the king's chapel, in which an organ was erected, and some pictures and statues displayed, was proposed as a model to the rest of the nation. But music was grating to the prejudiced ears of the Scottish clergy; sculpture and painting appeared instruments of idolatry; the furplice was a rag of popery; and every motion or gesture, prescribed by the liturgy, was a step towards that spiritual Babylon, so enuch the object of their horror and aversion. Every thing was deemed impious, but their own mystical comments on the Scriptures, which they idolized, and whose eastern prophetic style they employed in every common occurrence.

In will not be necessary to give a particular account of the ceremonics which the king was fo intent to establish. Such institutions, for a time, are elteemed either too divine to have proceeded from any other being than the supreme Creator of the universe, or too diabolical to have been des rived from any but an infernal demon. But no sooner is the mode of the controversy past, than they are universally discovered to be of so little importance, as scarcely to be mentioned with decency amidst the ordinary course of human transactions. It suffices here to remark, that the rites introduced by James regarded the kneeling at the facrament, private communion, private baptifin, confirmation of children, and the observance of Christmas and other festivals 1. The acts, establishing these coremonies, were afterwards known by the name of the articles of Perth, from the place where they were ratified by the affembly.

A conformity of discipline and worship between the churches of England and Scotland, which was James's aim, he never could hope to establish, but by first procuring an acknowledgment of his own authority in all spiritual causes; and no- CHAP. thing could be more contrary to the practice as well as principles of the presbyterian clergy. The ecclenatical courts pessessed the power of pronouncing excommunication; and that sentence, besides the spiritual consequences supposed to follow from it, was attended with immediate effects of the most important nature. The person excommunicated was thunned by every one as profane and impious; and his whole estate, during his life-time, and all his moveables, for ever, were forfened to the crown. Nor were the previous steps, requisite before pronouncing this fentence, formal or regular, in proportion to the weight of it. Without accuser, without furamons, without trial, any ecclefiastical court, however inferior, fometimes pretended, in a fuminary manner, to denounce excommunication for any cause, and against any person, even though he lived not within the bounds of their jurisdiction. And by this means, the whole tyranny of the inquilition, though without its order, was introduced into the kingdom.

² Franklyn, p. 25. Spotswood.

1617.

Bur the clergy were not content with the unlimited jurisdiction which they exercised in ecclefialtical matters: They assumed a censorial power over every part of administration; and, in all their fermons, and even prayers, mingling politics with religion, they inculcated the most seditious and most turbulent principles. Black, minister of St. Andrews, went so far', in a sermon, as to pronounce all kings the devil's children; he gave the queen of England the appellation of, Atheist; he faid, that the treachery of the king's heart was now fully discovered; and in his prayers for the queen he used these words; We must pray far her for the sassing faster, but we have no cause: She will never

^{. 2 1596,} * Spatfwood.

16.17.

CHAP. do us any good. When fummoned before the privy council, he refused to answer to a civil court for any thing delivered from the pulpit, even though the crime of which he was accused, was of a nature. The church adopted his raufe. raifed a fedition in Edinburgh The king, during fome time, was in the chands of the emaged pepulace; and it was not without courage, as well as dexterity, that, he was able to extricue himfelf". A few days after, a minister, preaching in the principal church of that capital, faid, that the king was possessed with a devil; and, that one devil being expelled, favou worle had entered in his place's. To which he added that the fubjects might lawfully rife, and take the fword out of his hand. Scarcely, even an ng the darkelt night of papal superstition, are there found such instances of priestly encroachments, as the annals of Scotland prefent to us during that period.

By these extravagant stretches of power, and by the patient conduct of James, the church began to lose ground, even before the king's accession to the throne of England: But no fooner had that event taken place, than he made the Scottish clergy fenfible, that he was become the sovereign of a great kingdom, which he governed with great authority. Though formerly he would have thought himself happy to have made a fair partition with them of the civil and ecclesiastical authority, he was now resolved to exert a supreme jurisdiction in church as well as state, and to put an end to their seditious practices. An assembly had been summoned at Aberdeen : But, on account of his journey to London, the prorogued it to the year following. Some of the clergy, difavow-

^{1 17} Dec. 1596. v Spotswood. * Ibid. y July 1604.

ing his ecclefiaftical supremacy, met at the time CHAP. first appointed, notwithstanding his prohibition. He XLVII. threw them ingo priton. Such of them as submitted, and acknowledged their error, were pardoned. The rest were brought to their trial. They were condemned for high treaton. The king gave them their lives; but banished them the kingdom. Six of them fuffered this penalty.

Time general affembly was afterwards induced.* to acknowledge the king's authority in fummoning eccleficalization and to fubrait to the jurifdiction and vifit in of the bishops. Even their favourite sentence of excommunication was declared invalid, unless confirmed by the ordinary. The king recommended to the interior courts the members whom they should elect to this assembly; and every thing was conducted in it with little appearance of choice and liberty ".

By his own prerogative likewife, which he feems to have stretched on this occasion, the king erected a court of high communion, in imitation of that which was established in England. The bishops and a few of the clergy, who had been fummoned, willingly acknowledged this court; and it proceeded immediately, upon business, as if its authority had been grounded on the full consent of the whole le-giflature.

Bur James referred the final blow for the time 13th Junewhen he should himself pay a visit to Scotland. He proposed to the parliament, which was then assembled, that they should enact, that, "whatever "his majesty should determine in the external "government of the church, with the consent of "the archbishops, bishops, and a competent num-. ber of the ministry, should have the force of Z Spottwood.

⁵ Spottwood.

^{* 6}th June 1610. • 15.h Feb. 161d.

CHAP. " law "." What number should be deemed competent was not determined: And their nomination was left entirely to the king: So that his eccleis fiastical authority, had this bill passed, would have been established in its Jull extent. Some of the clergy protefled. They apprehended, they faid, that the purity of their churck would, by means of this new authority, be polluted with all the rites and liturgy of the church of England. James, dreading clamour and opposition, dropped the bill, which had already passed the lords of articles; and afferted, that the inherent prerogative of the crown contained roth July, more power than was recognized by it. Some time after, he called, at St. Androws, a meeting of the bishops and thirty-fix of the most eminent clergy. He there declared his refolution of exerting his prerogative, and of establishing, by his own authority, the few ceremonies which he had recommended to them. They entreated him rather to fummon a general affembly, and to gain their affent. affembly was accordingly furnmoned to meet on the 25th of November enluing.

YLT this affembly, which met after the king's departure from Scotland, eluded all his applications; and it was not till the subsequent year, that he was able to procure a vote for receiving his ceremonies. And through every step of this atlair, in the parliament as well as in all the general affemblies, the nation betrayed the utmost reluctance to all these innovations; and nothing but James's importunity and authority had extorted a feeming consent, which was belied by the inward fentiments of all ranks of people. Even the few, over whom religious prejudices were not prevalent, thought national honour facrificed by a fervile imitation of the modes of worship practised in England. And every prudent man agreed in con-CHAP demning the measures of the king, who; by an ill-timed zeal for infignificant ceremonies, had betrayed, though in an opposite manner, equal narrowne's of mind with the persons whom he treated with fuch contempt. It was judged, that, had not uniferous humours been irritated y oppod they been allowed peaceably of evaponote; they would at least have subfided within the limits of law and civil authority. And that as all functical religious naturally circumferibe to very narrow bounds the numbers and riches of the ecclefiaftics; no fooner is their full five spent, than they lafe their credit over the people, and leave them under the natural and beneficent influence civil and moral obligations.

d Spotswood. Franklyn, p. 29.

XLVII.

4617.

Ar the fune time that James Gocked, in fo violent a manner, the religious principles of his Scottish subjects, he added in opposition to those of his English. He had observed, in his progress through England, that a judaical observance of the Sunday, chiefly by means of the puritans, was every day gaining ground throughout the kingdom, and that the people, under colour of religion, were, contrary to former practice, debarred such sports and recreations as contributed both to their health and their amusement's. Festivals, which, in other nations and ages, are partly dedicated to public part to mirth and fociety, were here totally appropriated to the offices of religion, and served to nourish those fullen and gloomy contemplations, to which the people were, of themselves, io unfortunately subject. The king imagined, that it would be easy to insule cheerfulness into this dark spirit of devotion. He issued a proclamation to allow and encourage, after divine service, all kinds f Kennet, p. 709.

CHAP. of lawful games and exercises; and, by his authority, he endeavoured to give fanction to a practice, which his subjects regarded as the utmost instance of profanencis and impiety.

Franklyn, p. 37.. To shew how rigid the English, chiefly the puriture, were become in this particular, a bill was introduced into the house of commons, in the 18th of the king, for the more shift observance of the Sunday, which they affected to call the Subbath. One Shepheld opposed this bill, objected to the appellation of Sabbath as puriturical, defended do by the appellation of Sabbath as puriturical, defended do by the appellation of Sabbath as puriturical, defended do by the appellation of No. Pym. The house of lords opposed so far this putiturical tainst of the commons, that they proposed, that the appellation of Sab vi should be changed into that of the Lard's David Jones, Jones, 15, 16 heb 1620, 28 May 1621. In Shepheld's sentence, his align a staid by the house to be great, exorbitint, unparalicit i.

C H A P. XLVIII.

Sir Walter Raleigh's expedition—His execution— Infurrection in Behemia -- Lofs of the Palatinate --- Negotiations with Spain --- A parliament ---Par - Fall of Bacon - Rupture between the king and the commons- - Protestation of the communs.

A T the time when fir Walter Raleigh was first CHAP. confined in the Lower, his violent and haughty XLVIII. temper had rendered him the most unpopular man 1618. in England; and his condemnation was chiefly Sir Walter owing to that public odium under which he la-expedition, bouted. During the thirteen years imprisonment which he fuffered, the fentiments of the nation were much changed with regard to him. Men had leifure to reflect on the hardship, not to say injustice, of his sentence; they pitied his active and enterprising spirit, which languished in the rigours of consinement; they were struck with the extensive genius of the man, who, being educated amidst naval and. military enterprises, had furpassed, in the pursuits of literature, even those of the most recluse and sedentary lives; and they admired his unbroken magnanimity, which, at his age, and under his circumstances, could engage him to undertake and execute so great a work as his History of the World. To increase these favourable dispositions, on which he built the hopes of recovering his liberty, he spread the report of a golden mine, which he had discovered in Guiana, and which was sufficient, according to his representation, not only to enrich all the adventurers, but to afford immense treasures to the nation. The king gave little credit to these mighty promises, both because he believed that no such mine as the one described was any-where in nature, and because he confidered Raleigh as, a man of desperate sortune:, whose business it was, by any means, to procure his freedom, and to reinstree himself in credit and authority. Thinking, however, that he had already undergone sussicient punishment, he released him from the Tower; and when his vaunts of the golden mine had induced multitudes to engage with him, the king gave them permission to try the adventure, and, at their defire, he conferred on Raleigh authorrity over his fellow-adventurers. Though strongly solicited, he still resused to grant him a pardon, which feemed a natural confequence, when he was intrusted with power and command. But James declared himfelf still distident of Raleigh's intentions; and he meant, he faid, to referve the former sentence, as a clicck upon his future behaviour.

CHAI XLVIII

RALEIGH well knew, that it was far from the king's purpose to invade any of the Spanish settlements: He therefore firmly denied that Spain had planted any colonies on that part of the coast where his mine lay. When Gondomar, the ambassador of · that nation, alarmed at his preparations, carried complaints to the king, Raleigh still protested the innocence of his intentions: and James assured Gondomar, that he durst not form any hostile attempt, but should pay with his head for so audacious an enterprise. The minister, however, concluding that twelve armed veffels were not fitted out without some purpose of invasion, conveyed the intelligence to the court of Madrid, who immediately gave orders for acming and fortifying all their fettlements, particularly those along the coast of Guiana.

WHEN the courage and avarice of the Spaniards and Portuguele had discovered so many new worlds.

they were resolved to show themselves superior to CHAP. the barbarous heathens whom they myaded, not XLVIII. only in arts and arms, but also in the justice of 1618. the quarrel: They applied to Alexander VI. who then filled the papal chairs and he generously bestowed on the Spaniards the whole western, and on the Portuguese the whole eastern part of the globe. The more scrupulous protestants, who acknowledged not the authority of the Roman-pontiff, established the first discovery as the foundation of their title; and if a pirate or fea-adventurer of their nation had but crected a stick or a stone on the coast, as a memorial of his taking possession, they concluded the whole continent to belong to them, and thought themselves entitled to expel or exterminate, as usurpers, the ancient possessors and inhabitants. was in this manner that fir Walter Raleigh, about twenty-three years before, had acquired to the crown of England, a claim to the continent of Guiana, a region as large as the half of Europe; and though he had immediately left the coast, yet he pretended that the English title to the whole remained certain and indefeasible. But it had happened in the mean time, that the Spaniards, not knowing, or not-acknowledging this imaginary claim, had taken possession of a part of Guiana, had formed a settlement on the river Oronooko, had built a little town called St. Thomas, and were there working some mines of finall value.

To this place Raleigh directly bent his course; and, remaining himself at the mouth of the river with sive of the largest ships, he sent up the rest to St. Thomas, under the command of his son, and a captain Keymis, a person entirely devoted to him. The Spaniards, who had expected this invasion, sired on the English at their landing, were repulsed, and pursued into the town. Young Raleigh, to encourage his men, called out, That this was the CHAP. true mine, and none but fools looked for any other; and xLVIII. advancing upon the Spaniards, received, a shot, of which he immediately expired. I his, difinayed not Kevmis and the others. I hey carried on the attack; got possession of the town, which they afterwards reduced to ashes; and found not in it any thing of value.

> RALEIGH did not pretend, that he had himself feen the mine, which he had engaged so many people to go in quest of: It was Keymis, he faid, who had formerly discovered it, and had brought him that lump of ore, which promised such immense treasures; yet Keymis, who owned that he was within two hours' march of the place, refused, on the most absurd pretences, to take any effectual step towards finding it; and he returned immediately to Raleigh, with the melancholy news of his fon's death; and the ill success of the enterprise. Sensible to reproach, and dreading punishment for his behaviour, Keymis, in despair, retired into his cabin, and put an end to his own life.

. The other adventurers now concluded, that they were deceived by Raleigh; that he never had known of any fuch mine as he pretended to go in fearch of; that his intention had ever been to plunder St. Thontas; and having encouraged his company by the spoils of that place, to have thence proceeded to the invasion of the other Spanish settlements; that he expected to repair his ruined fortunes by fuch daring enterprises; and that he trusted to the money he should acquire, for making his peace with England; or if that view failed him, that he purposed to retire into some other country, where his riches would fecure his retreat.

THE small acquisitions gained by the sack of St. Thomas discouraged Raleigh's companions from entering into these views; though there were many circumstances in the treaty and late transactions between

between the nations, which might invite them to en CHAP. gage in such a piratical war against the Spaniards. XLVIII.

1618.

gage in such a piratical war against the Spaniards. When England made peace with Spain, the example of Henry IV. was imitated, who, at the treaty of Vervins, finding a difficulty in adjusting. all questions with regard to the Indian trade, had agreed to pass over that article in total silence. The Spaniards having, all along, published severe edicts against the intercourse of any European nation with their colonies, interpreted this filence in their own favour, and confidered it as a tacit acquiescence of England in the established laws of Spain. English, on the contrary, pretended that, as they had never been excluded by any treaty from commerce with any part of the king of Spain's dominions, it was still as lawful for them to trade with his settlements in either Indies, as with his European. territories. In consequence of this ambiguity, many adventurers from England sailed to the Spanish Indies, and met with severe punishment when catight; as they, on the other hand, often stole, and when superior in power, forced a trade with the inhabitants, and resisted, nay sometimes plun-dered, the Spanish governors. Violences of this nature, which had been carried to a great height on both fides, it was agreed to bury in total oblivion; because of the difficulty which was found in remedying them, upon any fixed principles.

But as there appeared a great difference between private adventurers in fingle ships, and a sleet acting under a royal commission, Raleigh's companions thought it safest to return immediately to England, and carry him along with them to answer for his conduct. It appears that he employed many artifices, first to engage them to attack the Spanish settlements, and, failing of that, to make his escapainto France: But all these proving unsuccessful, he was delivered into the king's hands, and strictly Vol. VI.

CHAP: examined, as well as his fellow-adventurers, before the privy-council. The council, upon inquiry, found no difficulty in pronouncing, that the former fuspicions, with regard to Raleigh's intentions, had been well grounded; that he had abused the king in the representations which he had made of his projected adventure; that, contrary to his instructions, he had acted in an offenfive and hostile manner against his majesty's allies; and that he had wilfully burned and destroyed a town belonging to the king He might have been tried, either by common law for this act of violence and piracy, or by martial law for breach of orders: But it was an cstablished principle among lawyers, that as he lay under an actual attainder for high treason, he could not be brought to a new trial for any other crime. To fatisfy, therefore, the court of Spain, which raised the loudest complaints against him, the king made use of that power which he had purposely referved in his own hands, and figned the warrant for his execution upon his former sentence h.

RALEIGH, finding his fate, inevitable, collected all his courage: And though he had formerly made use of many mean artifices, such as feigning madness, sickness, and a variety of diseases, in order to protract his examination and procure his escape, he now resolved to act his part with bravery and resolution. 'Tis a sharp remedy, he said, but a sure one for all ills, when he felt the edge of the ax by which he was to be beheaded. His harangue to the people was calm and eloquent; and he endeavoured to revenge himself, and to load his enemies with the public hatred, by strong asseverations of facts, which, to fay the least, may be essemed very doubtful k.

E Sce this matter discussed in Bacon's Letters, published by D'r. Birch, p. 181. h See note [I] at the end of the volume. I Franklyn, p. 32. k He afferted, in the most solemn menner, that he had nowise contributed to Essex's death : But the last letter in Murden's Collection contains the strongest proof of the contrary. With lated mind, which, during his life, had displayed 29th Oct. Raleigh's itself in all his conduct and behaviour.

With the utmost indifference, he laid his head upon C H A P. the block, and received the fatal blow; and in his account death there appeared the same great, but ill-regulation.

No measure of James's reign was attended with more public distatisfaction than the punishment of fir Walter Raleigh. To execute a sentence which was originally so hard, which had been so long suspended, and which seemed to have been tacitly pardoned, by conferring on him a new trust and commission, was deemed an instance of cruelty and injustice. To sacrifice, to a concealed enemy of England, the life of the only man in the nation who had a high reputation for valour and military experience, was regarded as meanness and indiscretion: And the intimate connexions which the king was now entering into with Spain, being universally distasteful, rendered this proof of his complaisance still more invidious and unpopular.

• James had entertained an opinion, which was peculiar to himself, and which had been adopted by none of his predecessors, that any alliance, below that of a great king, was unworthy of a prince of Walcs; and he never would allow any princess but a daughter of France or Spain to be mentioned as a match for his fon!. This instance of pride, which really implies meanness, as if he could receive honour from any alliance, was so well known, that Spain had founded on it the hopes of governing, in the most important transactions, this monarch, so little celebrated for politics or prudence. During the life of Henry, the king of Spain had dropped some hints of bestowing on that prince his eldest daughter, whom he afterwards disposed of in marriage to the young king of France, Lewis XIII. At that time the views of the Spaniards were to

¹ Kennet, p. 703. 748.

1618.

CHAP engage James into a neutrality with regard to the succession of Cleves, which was disputed between the protestant and popish line m: But the bait did not then take; and James, in consequence of his alliance with the Dutch, and with Henry IV. of France, marched " four thousand men, under the command of fir Edward Cecil, who joined these two powers, and put the marquess of Brandenburgh and the palatine of Newbourg in posession of that dutchy.

GONDOMAR was, at this time, the Spanish ambassador in England; a man whose slattery was the more artful, because covered with the appearance of frankness and sincerity; whose politics were the more dangerous, because disguised under the mask of mirth and pleasantry. He now made offer of the second daughter of Spain to prince Charles; and, that he might render the temptation irrelistible to the necessitous monarch, he gave hopes of an immense fortune, which should attend the princess. The court of Spain, though determined to contract no alliance with a heretic o, entered into negotiations with James, which they artfully protracted, and, amidst every disappoinment, they still redoubled his hopes of success. The transactions in Germany, so important to the Austrian greatness, became every day a new motive for this duplicity of conduct.

Infurrections in Bohemia.

In that great revolution of manners which happened during the fixteenth and the seventeenth centuries, the only nations who had the honourable, though often melancholy advantage, of making an essort for their expiring privileges, were such as, together with the principles of civil liberty, were animated with a zeal for religious parties and opinions. Besides the irresistible force of standing armies, the European

[.]m Rushworth, vol. i. p. 2.

i⁶ 1510. • La Boderie, vol, ii. p. 30. P Franklyn, p. 71.

European princes possessed this advantage, that hey were descended from the ancient royal families; that they continued the same appellations of magistrates, the same appearance of civil government; and testraining themselves by all the forms of legal administration, could insensibly impose the yoke on their unguarded subjects. Even the German nations, who formerly broke the Roman chains, and restored liberty to mankind, now lost their own liberty, and saw with grief the absolute authority of their princes simply established among them. In their circumstances, nothing but a pious zeal, which disregards all motives of human prudence, could have made them entertain hopes of preserving any longer those privileges which their ancestors, through so many ages, had transmitted to them.

As the house of Austria, throughout all her extensive dominions, had ever made religion the pretence for her usurpations, she now met with resistance from a like principle; and the catholic religion, as usual, had ranged itself on the side of monarchy; the protestant, on that of liberty. The states of Bohemia, having taken arms against the emperor Matthias, continued their revolt against his fuccessor Ferdinand, and claimed the observance of. all the edicts enacted in favour of the new religion, together with the restoration of their asteient laws and constitution. The neighbouring principalities, Silesia, Moravia, Lusatia, Austria, even the kingdom of Hungary, took part in the quarrel; and throughout all these populous and martial provinces, the spirit of discord and civil war had universally diffused itself?.

FERDINAND II. who possessed more vigour and greater abilities, though not more lenity and moderation, than are usual with the Austrian princes, strongly armed himself for the recovery of his au-

1619.

CHAP thorny; and, besides employing the assistance of his XLVIII. subjects, who professed the ancient religion, he engaged on his fide a powerful alliance of the neighbouring potentates. All the catholic princes of the empire had embraced his defence; even Saxony, the most powerful of the protestant: Poland had declared itself in his favour, ; and, above all, the Spanish monarch, deeming his own interest closely connected with that of the younger branch of his family, prepared powerful fuccours from Italy, and from the Low Countries; and he also advanced large sums for the support of Ferdinand and of the catholic religion.

THE states of Bohemia, alarmed at these mighty prèparations, began also to solicit foreign assistance; and, together with that support which they obtained from the evangelical union in Germany, they endeavoured to establish connexions with greater princes. They cast their eyes on Frederic, elector palatine. They considered, that besides commanding no despicable force of his own, he was fon-in-law to the king of England, and nephew to prince Maurice, whose authority was become almost absolute in the United They hoped that these princes, moved . by the connexions of blood, as well as by the tie of their common religion, would interest themselves in all the fortunes of Frederic, and would promote his greatness. They therefore made him a tender of their crown, which they considered as elective; and the young palatine, stimulated by ambition, without consulting either James or Maurice, whose opposition he foresaw, immediately accepted the offer, and marched all his forces into Bohemia, in support of his new subjects.

THE news of these events no sooner reached England, than the whole kingdom was on fire to engage in the quarrel. Scarcely was the ardour greater, with which all the states of Europe, in former ages flew CHAP. to rescue the Holy Land from the dominion of infi-XLVIII. dels. The nation was, as yet, fincerely attached to the blood of their monarchs, and they confidered their connexion with the palatine, who had married a daughter of England, as very close and intimate; and when they heard of catholics carrying on wars and perfecutions against protestants, they thought their own interest deeply concerned, and regarded their neutrality as a base desertion of the cause of God, and of his holy religion. In such a quarrel, they would gladly have marched to the opposite extremity of Europe, have plunged themselves into a chaos of German politics, and have expended all the blood and treasure of the nation, by maintaining a contest with the whole house of Austria, at the very time, and in the very place, in which it was the most potent, and almost irresistible.

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 13, 14. . Franklyn, p. 49.

Bur James, besides that his temper was too little enterprising for such vast undertakings, was resfrained by another motive, which had a mighty influence over him: • He refused to patronize the revolt of subjects against their sovereign. From the very first he denied to his son-in-law the title of King of Bohemia: He forbade him to be prayed for in the churches under that appellation: And though he owned that he had nowise examined the pretentions, privileges, and constitution of the revolted llates", fo exalted was his idea of the rights of kings, that he concluded subjects must ever be in the wrong, when they stood in opposition to those who had acquired or assumed that majestic title. Thus, even in measures founded on true politics, James intermixed so many narrow prejudices, as diminished his authority, and exposed him to the imputation of weakness and of error.

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 12 13.

Franklyn, p. 48.

H 4

MEANWHILE

1 1 m

CHAP. MANWHILE affairs every where hastened to a XLVIII. Exist. Ferdinand levied a great force, under the count of the duke of Bavaria and the count of Bucquoy; and advanced upon his enemy in Bohe- " miai In the Low Countries, Spinola collected a veteran army of thirty thousand men. When Edmonds, the king's resident at Brussels, made remonstrances to the archduke Alkert, he was answered. that the orders for this armament had been transmitted to Spinola from Madrid, and that he alone knew the secret destination of it. Spinola again told tne minister, that his orders were still sealed; but, if Edmonds would accompany him in his march to Coblentz, he would there open them, and give him full satisfaction". It was more easy to see his intentions, than to prevent their success. one time, it was known in England that Frederic, being defeated in the great and decisive battle of Prague, had fled with his family into Holland, and Loss of the that Spinola had invaded the Palatinate, and, meet-Palatinate ing with no resistance, except from some princes of the union, and from one English regiment of 2400 men, commanded by the brave fir Horace Vere*, had, in a little time, reduced the greater part of that principality.

High were now the murmurs, and complaints against the king's neutrality and unactive disposition. The happiness and tranquillity of their own country became distasteful to the English, when they reflected on the grievances and distresses of their protestant brethren in Germany. They confidered not, that their interpolition in the wars of the continent, though agreeable to religious zeal, could not, at that time, be justified by they sound maxims of politics; that, however exorbitant the Austrian greatness, the danger was still too distant to give any just alarm to England; that mighty resistance would yet be made by so many potent and was like CHAP. princes and states in Germany, ere they would yield XLVIII. their neck to the yoke; that France, now engaged 1620. to contract a double alliance with the Austrian family, must necessarily be soon roused from her. lethargy, and oppose the progress of so hated a rival; that in the farther advance of conquelts, even the interests of the two branches of that am-bitious family must interfere, and beget mutual , jealoufy and opposition; that a land-war, carried on at fuch a distance, would waste the blood and treafure of the English nation, without any hopes of success; that a sea-war, indeed, might be both safe and successful against Spain, but would not affect the enemy in fuch vital parts as to make them stop their career of fuccess in Germany, and abandon ail their acquisitions; and that the prospect of recovering the Palatinate being at present desperate, the assair was reduced to this simple question, whether peace and commerce with Spain, or the uncertain hopes of plunder and of conquest in the Indies, were preferable? a question which, at the beginning of the king's reign, had already been decided, and perhaps with reason, in favour of the formes advantages.

^{*} Franklyn, p. 44. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 14.

* Ibid. p. 42, 43. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 15. Kennet, p. 723.

JAMES might have defended his pacific measures Negotia-by such plausible arguments: But these, though the spain. chief, seem not to have been the sole motives which swayed him. He had entertained the notion, that, as his own justice and moderation had shone out so conspicuously throughout all these transactions, the whole house of Austria, though not awed by the power of England, would willingly, from mere respect to his virtue, submit themselves to so equitable an arbitration. He flattered himself that, after he had formed an intimate connexion with the Spanish monarch, by means of his son's marriage, the restitution of the Palatinate might be procured,

CHAP. procured, from the motive alone of friendship and xLVIII. perforal attachment. He perceived not, that his 1620; unactive virtue, the more it was extolled, the greater disregard was it exposed to. He was not fensible that the Spanish match was itself attended with such difficulties, that all his art of negotiation would scarcely be able to surmount them; much less, that this match could it good policy be depended on, as the means of proceeding such extraordinary advantages. His unwarlike dispesition, increased by age, rivetted him still faster in his errors, and determined him to feek the restoration of his fon-in-law, by remonstrances and entreaties, by arguments and embassies, rather than by blood and violence. And the same defect of courage which held him in awe of foreign nations, made him likewise afraid of shocking the prejudices of his own fubjects, and kept him from openly avowing the measures which he was determined to pursue. Or, perhaps, he hoped to turn these prejudices to account, and, by their means, engage his people to furnish him with supplies, of which their excessive frugality had hitherto made them so sparing and reserved y.

A parliament.

He first tried the expedient of a benevolence or free-gift from individuals; pretending the urgency of the case, which would not admit of leisure for any other measure: But the jealousy of liberty was now roused, and the nation regarded these pretended benevolences as real extortions, contrary to law, and dangerous to freedom, however authorised by ancient precedent. A parliament was found to be the only resource which could furnish any large · fupplies; and writs were accordingly issued for fummoning that great council of the nation z.

7621. e6th June.

In this parliament there appeared, at first, nothing but duty and submission on the part of the y Franklyn, p. 47. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 21. z See note [K] at the end of the volume.

commons; and they seemed determined to sacrifice CHAP. every thing, in order to maintain a good correspondence with their prince. They would allow no mention to be made of the new customs or impositions, which had been so eagerly disputed in the former parliament 2: The imprisonment of the members of that parliament was here, by some, complained of; but by the authority of the graver and more prudent part of the house, that grievance was buried in oblivion 5: And, being informed that the king had remitted several considerable sums to the palatine, the commons, without a negative, voted him two subsidies 4, and that too, at the very beginning of the session, contrary to the maxims frequently adopted by their predecessors.

Afterwards, they proceeded, but in a very temperate manner, to the examination of grievances. They found, that patents had been granted to fir Giles Mompesson and sir Francis Michel, for licensing inns and ale-houses; that great sums of money had been exacted, under pretext of these licences; and that such inn-keepers as presumed to continue their business, without satisfying the rapacity of the patentees, had been severely punished by fine, imprisonment, and vexatious prosecutions.

THE same persons had also procured a patent, which they shared with sir Edward Villiers, brother to Buckingham, for the sole making of gold and silver thread and lace, and had obtained very extraordinary powers for preventing any rivalship in these manufactures: They were armed with authority to search for all goods, which might interfere with their patent; and even to punish, at their own will and discretion, the makers, importers, and venders of such commodities. Many had grievously suffered by this exorbitant jurisdiction; and the lace

^a Journ. 5 Dec. 1621.
^a Journ. 16 Feb. 3...

b Journ. 12, 16 Feb. 1620.

CHAP. which had been manufactured by the patentees xiviii. was univerfally found to be adulterated, and to be 2621. composed more of copper than of the precious metals.

> THESE grievances the commons represented to the king; and they met with a very gracious and very cordial reception. He seemed even thankful for the information given him; and declared him, felf ashamed, that such abuses, unittiowingly to him, had creeped into his administration. I assure "you," said he, "had I before heard these things " complained of, I would have done the office of " a just king, and out of parliament have punished "them, as severely, and peradventure more, than "you now intend to do"." A sentence was passed for the punishment of Michel and Mompesson. It was executed on the former. The latter broke prison and escaped. Villiers was, at that time, sent purposely on a foreign employment; and his guilt being less enormous, or less apparent, than that of the others, he was the more easily protected by the credit of his brother Buckingham'.

Bacon's fall.

Encouraged by this fuccess, the commons carried their scrutiny, and still with a respectful hand, into other abuses of importance. The great seal was, at that time, in the hands of the celebrated Bacon, created viscount St. Alban's; a man univerfally admired for the greatness of his genius, and beloved for the courteousness and humanity of his He was the great ornament of his age behaviour.

d Franklyn, p. 39. Russworth, p. 25. * Franklyn, p. 52.

and

Rufnworth, vol. i. p. 27. f Yelverton, the attorney-general, was accused by the commons for drawing the patents for these monopolies, and for supporting them. He spologifed for himfelf, that he was forced by Buckingham, and that he supposed it to be the king's pleasure. The lords were so offunded at these articles of defence, though necessary to the attorneygeneral, that they fined him 10,000 pounds to the king, 5000 to the The fines, however, were afterwards semitted. Franklyn, Rushworth, vol. i. p. 31, 32, &c.

and nation; and nought was wanting to render him, CHAP. the ornament of human nature itself, but, that XLVIII. through of mind which might check his intemperate 1621. defire of preferment, that could add nothing to his dignity, and might restrain his profuse inclination to expence, that could be requisite neither for his honour nor entertainment. His want of œconomy, and his indulgence to rvants, had involved him in ntessities; and in order to supply his prodigality, he had been tempted to take bribes; by the title of presents, and that in a very open manner, from luitors in chancery. It appears that it had been usual for former chancellors to take presents; and it is pretended that Bacon, who followed the same dangerous practice, had still, in the seat of justice, preserved the integrity of a judge, and had given just decrees against those very persons, from whom, he had received the wages of iniquity. Complaints rose the louder on that account, and at last reached the house of commons, who sent up an impeachment against him to the peers. The chancellor, conscious of guilt, deprecated the vengeance of his judges, and endeavoured, by a general avowal, to elcape the confusion of a stricter inquiry. The lords infifted on a particular confession of all his cor-He acknowledged twenty-eight articles; and was sentenced to pay a fine of 40,000 pounds, to be imprisoned in the Tower during the king's pleasure, to be for ever incapable of any office, place, or employment, and never again to fit in parliament, or come within the verge of the court.

This dreadful sentence, dreadful to a man of nice sensibility to honour, he survived sive years; and, being released in a little time from the Tower, his genius, yet unbroken, supported itself amidst involved circumstances and a depressed spirit, and shone out in literary productions, which have made his guilt or weaknesses be forgotten or overlooked

by

CHAP. by posterity. In consideration of his great merit, the king remitted his fine, as well as all the other parts of his sentence, conferred on him a large penfion of 1800 pounds a-year, and employed every expedient to alleviate the weight of his age and misfortunes. And that great philosopher, at last, acknowledged with regret, that he had too long neglected the true ambition of a fine genius; and by plunging into business and are its, which require much less capacity, but greater firmness of mind, than the pursuits of learning, had exposed himself to fuch grievous calamities g.

THE commons had entertained the idea, that they were the great patrons of the people, and that the redress of all grievances must proceed from them; and to this, principle they were chiefly beholden for the regard and confideration of the public. In the execution of this office, they now kept their ears open to complaints of every kind; and they carried their researches into many grievances, which, though of no great importance, could not be touched on, without fenfibly affecting the king and his ministers. The prerogative seemed every moment to be invaded; the king's authority, in every article, was disputed; and James, who awas willing to correct the abuses of his power, would not submit to have his power itself questioned and denied. After the house, therefore, had sitten near fix months, and had, as yet, brought no confiderable business to a full conclusion, the king resolved, under pretence of the advanced season, to interrupt their proceedings and he sent them word, that he was determined, in a little time, to adjourn them till next winter. The commons made application to the lords,

R It is thought, that appeals from chancery to the house of peers first came into practice, while Bacon held the great seal. under the form of writs of error, had long before lain against the courts of law. Blackstone's Commentary, vol. iii. p. 454.

lords, and defired them to join in a petition for de CHAP. laying the adjournment; which was refused by the xLVIII. upper house. The king regarded this project of a joint petition as an attempt to force him from his measures: He thanked the peers for their refusal to concur in it, and told them, that, if it were their defire, he would delay the adjournment, but would not so far comply with the request of the work nouse. And thus, in these great national affairs, the same peevishness, which, in private altercations, often raises a quarrel from the smallest beginnings, produced a mutual coldness and disgust between the king and the commons.

DURING the recess of parliament, the king used Rupture every measure to render himself popular with the between the king nation, and to appeale the rifing ill-humour of its and the representatives. He had voluntarily offered the commons. parliament to circumscribe his own prerogative, and to abrogate for the future his power of granting monopolies. He now recalled all the patents of that kind, and redressed every article of grievance, to the number of thirty-seven, which had ever been complained of in the house of commons. But he gained not the end which he proposed. The difgult, which had appeared at parting, could not so suddenly be dispelled. He had likewise been so im prudent as to commit to prison sir Edwin Sandys k, without any known, cause, besides his activity and vigour in discharging his duty as a member of parliament. And, above all, the transactions in Germany were sufficient, when joined to the king's cautions, negotiations, and delays, to inflame that jealoufy of honour and religion which prevailed throughout the nation. This fammer, the ban of the empire

h Rushworth, vol. i. p. 35 i Ibid. vol. i. p. 36. Kennet, P. 733. k Journ. 1 Dec. 1621.

had

To shew to what degree the nation was influmed with regard to the Palatinate, there occurs a remarkable story this lession. One Floyd, a prisoner in the Fleet, a catholic, had dropped Some expressions, in pri-

CHAP.

CHAP, published against the elector palatine; time, conquered by that prince; and measures were taking in the empire for bestowing on him the electoral dignity, of which the palatine was then despoiled. Frederic nowelived with his numerous family, in poverty and distress, either in Holland or at Sedan, with his uncle the date of Bouillon; and throughout all the new conquests, in both the Palatinates, as well as in Bohemia, Austria, and Lusatia, the progress of the Austrian arms was attended with rigours and severities, exercised against the professors of the reformed religion.

14th Nov. THE zeal of the commons immediately moved them, upon their affembling, to take all these transactions into consideration. They framed a remonstrance, which they intended to carry to the king. They represented, that the enormous growth of the Austrian power threatened the liberties of Europe; that the progress of the catholic religion in Enger land bred the most melancholy apprehensions lest it should again acquire an ascendant in the kingdom; that the indulgence of his majesty towards the professors of that religon had encouraged their insolence and temerity; that the uncontrolled conquests, made by the Austrian family in Germany, raised mighty expectations in the English papists; but above all, that the prospect of the Spanish match elevated them so far as to > vate conversation, as if he were pleased with the misfortunes of the palatine and his wife. The commons were in a stame, and, pretending to be a court of judicature and of record, proceeded to condemn him to a tevere punishment. The house of lords excelled this encroachment; and, what was extraordinary, confidering the present humour of the lower house, the latter acquiesced in the sentiments of the peers. This is almost the only pretension of the English commons, in which they have not prevailed. Happily for the nation, they have been successful in almost all their other claims. See Parliamentary History, vol. v. p. 428, 429, &c. Jouin. 4, 8, 12 May 1621.

m Franklyn, p. 73.

hope for an entire toleration, if not the interaction of their religion. The country therefore, entreated his majesty, that he would mediately undertake the desence of the palatine and maintain it by force of arms; that he would turn his sword against Spain, whose armies and treasures were the chief support of the catholic interest in Europe; that he would enter into no negotiation for the marriage of his son but with a protestant princes; that the children of popish recusants should be taken from their parents, and be committed to the care of protestant teachers and schoolmasters; and that the sines and consistations, to which the catholics were by law liable, should be levied with the utmost severity.

By this bold step, unprecedented in England for many years, and scarcely ever heard of in peaceable times, the commons attacked at once all the king's favourite maxims of government; his cautious and pacific measures, his lenity towards the Romish religion, and his attachment to the Spanish alliance, from which he promised himself such mighty ad-But what most disgusted him was, their vantages. scenning invasion of his prerogative, and their pretending, under colour of advice, to direct his conduct in such points as had ever been acknowledged. to belong folely to the management and direction of the fovereign. He was, at that time, absent at Newmarket; but as foon as he heard of the intended remonstrance of the commons, he wrote a letter to the speaker, in which he sharply rebuked the house for openly debating matters far above their reach and capacity, and he strictly forbade them to meddle with any thing that regarded his government, or deep matters of state, and especially not to touch on his son's marriage with the daughter of Spain, nor to attack the honour of that king, or

P. 737.
Vol. VI.

the more to intimidate them, he mentioned the imprisonment of fir Edwin Sandys; and though he defined that the confinement of that member had been owing to any offence committed in the house, he plainly told them, that he thought himself fully entitled to punish every misdemeanor in parliament, as well during its sitting as after its dissolution; and that he intended thenceforward is a sufficient man, whose insolent behaviour there should minister occasion of offence.

This violent letter, in which the king, though he here imitated former precedents, may be thought not to have acted altogether on the defensive, had the effect which might naturally have been expected from it: The commons were inflamed, not terrified. Secure of their own popularity, and of the bent of the nation towards a war with the catholics abroad, and the persecution of popery at home, they little dreaded the menaces of a prince who was unsupported by military force, and whose gentle temper would, of itself, so soon disarm his severity. In a new remonstrance, therefore, they still insisted on their former remonstrance and advice; and they maintained, though in respectful terms, that they were entitled to interpose with their counsel in all matters of government; that, to possess entire freedom of speech, in their debates on public business, was their ancient and undoubted right, and an inheritance transmitted to them from their ancestors; and that, if any member abused this liberty, it belonged to the house alone, who were witnesses of his offence, to inflict a proper censure upon him P.

So vigorous an answer was nowise calculated to appeale the king. It is said, when the approach of the committee who were to present it was notified CHAP. no him, he ordered twelve chairs to be brought. XLVIII. answer was prompt and sharp. He told the house, that their remonstrance was more like a denunciation. of war than an address of dutiful subjects; that their pretension to inquire into all state affairs, without exception, was such a plenipotence as none of their ancestors, eval during the reign of the weakest princes, had ever pretended to; that public transactions depended on a complication of views and intelligence, with which they were entirely unacquainted; that they could not better shew their wisdom, as well as duty, than by keeping within their proper sphere'; and that, in any butiness which depended on his prerogative, they had no title to interpose with their advice, except when he was pleased . to desire it. And he concluded with these memorable words: And though we cannot allow of your style, in mentioning your ancient and undoubted right and inheritance, but would rather have wished that we had faid, that your privileges were derived from the grace and permission of our ancestors and us (for the most of them grew from precedents, which shows rather a toleration than inheritance); yet we are pleased to give you our royal assurance, that as long as you contain yourselves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preserve your lawful libertics and privileges as ever any of our predecessors were, nay, as to preserve our own royal prerogative .

Franklyn, p. 60. Rustworth, vol. i. p. 43. Kennet, p. 741.

This open pretention of the king's naturally gave great alarm to the house of commons. They saw their title to every privilege, if not plainly denied, ⁹ Kennet, p. 43.

Ne suter ultra crepidam. This expression is imagined to be insolent and disobliging: But it was a Latin proverb familiarly used on all occasions.

Kennet, p. 743.

XLVIII 18th Dec.

CHAP. Vet considered at least as precarious. It might be forfeited by abuse, and they had already abused it.

They thought proper, therefore, immediately to oppose pretension to pretension. They framed a protestation, in which they repeated all their former claims for freedom of speech, and an unbounded authority to interpose will their advice and counsel. And they asserted, That the khertics, franchises, privileges, and jurisdictions of parliament, are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the subjects of England '.

Protestation of the Commons.

> THE king, informed of these increasing heats and jealousies in the house, hurried to town. He sent immediately for the journals of the commons; and, with his own hand, before the council, he tore out this protestation"; and ordered his reasons to be inferted in the council-book. He was doubly difpleased, he said, with the protestation of the lower house, on account of the manner of framing it, as well as of the matter which it contained. It was tumultuously voted, at a late hour, and in a thin house; and it was expressed in such general and ambiguous terms, as might serve for a foundation to the most enormous claims, and to the most unwarrantable usurpations upon his prerogative".

> THE meeting of the house might have proved dangerous after so violent a breach. It was no longer possible, while men were in such a temper, to finish any business. The king, therefore, prorogued the parliament, and soon after dissolved it by proclamation; in which he also made an apology to the public for his whole conduct.

THE leading members of the house, sir Edward Coke and fir Robert Philips, were committed to the Tower; Selden, Fym, and Mallory, to other prisons . As a lighter punishment, fir Dudley Digges, sir Thomas Crew, sir Nathanicl Rich, sir

^{*} See note [L] at the end of the volume. " Journ. x8 Dec. x621. "Franklyn, p. 65. * Franklyn, p. 66. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 55. James

James Perrot, joined in commission with others, CHAP. were sent to Ireland, in order to execute some XLVIII. business. The king, at that time, enjoyed, at least exercised, the prerogative of employing any man, even without his consent, in any branch of public service.

Sir John Savile, a powerful man in the house of commons, and zer ous opponent of the court, was made comparoller of the household; a privy countellor, and foon after a baron. This event is memorable; as being the first instance, perhaps, in the whole history of England, of any king's advancing a man on account of parliamentary interest, and of opposition to his measures. However irregular this practice, it will be regarded by political reasoners, as one of the most early and most infallible symptoms of a regular established liberty....

THE king having thus, with so rash and indiscreet a hand, torn off that facred veil which had hitherto covered the English constitution, and which threw an obscurity upon it so advantageous to royal prerogative, every man began to indulge himself in political reasonings and inquiries; and the same factions which commenced in parliament were propagated throughout the nation. In vain did James, by reiterated proclamations, forbid the discoursing of state affairs. Such proclamations, if, they had any effect, served rather to inflame the curiosity of the public. And, in every company or fociety, the late transactions became the subject of argument and debate.

ALL history, said the partisans of the court, as well as the history of England untify the king's Polition with regard to the origin of popular privileges;

Franklyn, p. 66. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 55. 2 Kennet, P. 749. 2 Franklyn, p. 56. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 21. 36. 55. The king also, in imitation of his predecessors, gave rules to picachers. Franklyn, p. 70. The pulpit was at that time much nore dangerous than the press. Few people could read, and still twer were in the practice of reading.

CHAP. leges; and every reasonable man must allow, that XLVIII. as monarchy is the most simple form of governitaring it must first have occurred to rude and "uninstructed mankind. The other complicated and " artificial additions were the fuccessive invention of sovereigns and legislators; or, if they were obtruded on the prince by seditious subjects, their origin must appear, on that very account, still more precarious and unfavourable. In England, the authority of the king, in all the exterior forms of government, and in the common style of law, appears totally abfolute and fovereign; nor does the real spirit of the constitution, as it has ever discovered itself in practice, fall much short of these appearances. The parliament is created by his will; by his will it is dissolved. It is his will alone, though at the desire of both houses, which gives authority to laws. To all foreign nations, the majefly of the monarch feems to merit fole attention and regard. And no subject, who has exposed himself to royal indignation, can hope to live with fafety in the kingdom; nor can he even leave it, according to law, without the consent of his master. If a magistrate, environed with fuch power and splendour, should consider his authority as sacred, and regard himself as the anointed of heaven, his pretentionsemay bear a very favourable construction. Or, allowing them to be merely pious frauds, we need not be surprised, that the same stratagem which was practised by Minos, Numa, and the most celebrated legislators of antiquity, hould now, in these restless and inquisitive times, be employed by the king of England. Subjects are not raised above that quality, though afsembled in parliament. The same humble respect and deference is still due to their prince. Though he indulges them in the privilege of laying before him their domestic grievances, with which they are Exposed to be best acquainted, this warrants not their bold intrusion into every province of government. And 15 .

And, to all judicious examiners, it must appear, CHAP.

"That the lines of duty are as much transgressed "VIII.

by a more independent and less respectful exercise 1621.

" of acknowledged powers, as by the usurpation of

" fuch as are new and unufual."

THE lovers of liberty, throughout the nation, reasoned after a different manner. It is in vain, said they, that the king races up the English government to its first origin, in order to represent the privileges of parliament as dependent and precarious: Prescription, and the practice of so many _ages, must, long ere this time, have given a sanction to these assemblies, even though they had been derived from an origin no more dignified than that which he affigns them. If the written records of the English nation, as afferted, represent parliaments to have arisen from the consent of monarchs, the principles of human nature, when we trace government a step higher, must shew us that monarchs themselves owe all their authority to the voluntary submission of the people. But in fact, no age can be shown, when the English government was altogether an unmixed monarchy: And, if the privileges of the nation have, at any period, been overpowered by violent irruptions of foreign force or domestic usurpation; the generous spirit of the people has ever leized the first opportunity of reestablishing the ancient government and constitution. Though in the style of the laws, and in the usual forms of administration, royal authority may be represented as sacred and supreme; whatever is essential to the exercise of sovereign and legislative power must still be regarded as equally divine and inviolable. Or, if any mitination be made in this respect, the preference is furely due to those national councils, by whose interposicion the exceptancies of tyrannical power are restrained, and that the ced liberty is preserved, which heroic spirits, in all have deemed more precious than life itself. Nor

104

CHAP indifficient to say, that the mild and equitable ad-XLVIII indifficient to say, that the mild and equitable adindifficient to say, the say that the mild and equitable adindifficient to say, the say that the mild and equitable adparticles and the say that the mild and equitable adition to say the say that the say that the mild and equitable adition to say the say that the say t

" principles, it is requisite to watch him with the fame care, and to oppose him with the same vi-

" gour, as if he had indulged himself in all the " excesses of cruelty and tyranny."

AMIDST these disputes, the wise and moderate in the nation endeavoured to preserve, as much as possible, an equitable neutrality between the opposite parties; and the more they reslected on the course of public assairs, the greater dissiculty they found in fixing just sentiments with regard to them. On the one hand, they regarded the very rise of parties as a happy prognostic of the establishment of liberty; nor could they ever expect to enjoy, in a mixed government, so invaluable a blessing, without suffering that inconvenience, which, in such governments, has ever attended it. But when they considered, on the other hand, the necessary aims and pursuits of both parties, they were struck with apprehension of the consequences, and could discover no feasible plan of accommodation between them. From long practice, the crown was now possessed of so exorbitant a prerogative, that it was not sufficient for liberty to remain on the defensive, or endeavour to secure the little ground which was left her: It was become necessary to carry on an offensive war, and to circumscribe, within more narrow, as well as more exact bounds, the authority of the fovereign. Upon make prevocation, it could not but happen, that the prince, however just and modern, would endeavour to repress his opponents; and, as he stood upon the very brink strary power, it was to be feared that he hastily and unknowingly, pass those limits, which were not precifely marked by the confitution. C H A P. The turbulent government of England, ever fluctuating between privilege and prerogative, would afford a variety of precedents, which might be pleaded on both fides. In such delicate questions, the people must be divided: The arms of the state were still in their hands: A civil, war must ensue; a civil war where no party or both parties would justly bear the blame, and where the good and virtuous would scarcely know what vows to form; were it not that liberty, so necessary to the perfection of human ciety, would be sufficient to bias their affections towards the side of its defenders.

10 4

C H A P. XLIX.

Negotiations with regard to the marriage and the Pulatinate - Character of Buckingham -Prince's, journey to Spain-Marriage treaty broken—A parliament—Return of Bristol -Rupture with Spain-Treaty with France --- Mansfeldt's expedition--- Death of the king ----His character.

Negotiations with segard to the marziage and the Pala-BRate.

CHAP. TO wrest the Palatinate from the hands of the XLIX. emperor and the duke of Bavaria, must always have been regarded as a difficult talk for the power of England, conducted by so unwarlike a prince as James: It was plainly impossible, while the breach subsisted between him and the commons. The king's negotiations, therefore, had they been, managed with ever so great dexterity, must now carry less weight with them; and it was easy to elude all his applications. When lord Digby, his ambassador to the emperor, had desired a cessation of hostilities, he was referred to the duke of Bavaria, who commanded the Austrian armies. The duke of Bavaria told him, that it was entirely superfluous to form any treaty for that purpose. Hostilities are already ceased, said he; and I doubt not but I shall be able to prevent their revival by keeping firm possession of the Palatinate, till a final agreement shall be concluded between the contending parties. Notwithstanding this insult; James endeavoured to resume with the emperor a treaty of aknowmodation; and he opened the negotiations at Brussels, under the mediation of archduke Albert; and after his death, ranklyn, p. 57 Ruffworth, vol. i. p. 38.

which happened about this time, under that of the CHAP. Infanta: When the conferences were entered upon, XLIX. it was found, that the powers of these princes to - 1622. determine in the controversy were not sufficient or satisfactory. Schwartzenbourg, the Imperial minister, was expected at London; and it was hoped that he would bring more ample authority: His commission referred envirely to the negotiation at Brusfels. It was not difficult for the king to perceive, that his applications were neglected by the emperor; but as he had no choice of any other expedient, and it seemed the interest of his son-in-law to keep alive his pretensions, he was still content to follow Ferdinand through all his fhifts and evalions. Nor was he entirely discouraged, even when the Imperial diet at Ratitbon, by the influence or rather authority of the emperor, though contrary to the protestation of Saxony, and of all the protestant princes and cities, had transferred the electoral dignity from the palatine to the duke of Bavaria.

MEANWHILE the efforts made by Frederic, for the recovery of his dominions, were vigorous. Three armies were levied in Germany by his authority, under three commanders, duke Christian of Brunswick, the prince of Baden-Dourlach, and count Mansfeldt. The two former generals were defeated by count Tilly and the Imperialists: The third, though much inferior in force to his enemies, still maintained the war; but with no equal supplies of money either from the palatine or the king of England. It was chiefly by pillage and free quarters in the Palatinate, that he subsisted his army. As the Austrians were regularly paid, they were kept in more exact disci-pline; and James-jukly became apprehensive, lest so unequal a contest, besides ravishing the palatine's hereditary dominions, would end in the total alienation of the people's affections from their ancient sovereign, by whom they were plundered, and in an attachment to their new masters, hy whom they were protected. CHAI protected . He persuaded therefore his son-in-law to disarm, under colour of duty and submission to the emperor: And accordingly, Mancfeldt was dismissed from the palatine's service; and that samous general withdrew his army into the Low Countries, and there received a commission from the States of the United Provinces.

To shew how little account was made of James's negotiations abroad, there is a pleafantry mentioned by all historians, which, for that reason, shall have place here. In a farce, acted at Brussels, a courier was introduced carrying the doleful news that the--Palatinate would foon be wrested from the house of Austria; so powerful were the fuccours which, from all quarters, were hastening to the relief of the despoiled elector: The king of Denmark had agreed to-contribute to his affistance a hundred thousand pickled herrings, the Dutch a hundred thousand butter-boxes, and the king of England a hundred thousand ambassadors. On other occasions, he was painted with a scabbard, but without a sword; or with a fword, which nobody could draw, though feveral were pulling at it 4.

IT was not from his negotiations with the emperor or the duke of Bavaria, that James expected any fuccess in his project of restoring the palatine: His eyes were entirely turned towards Spain; and if he could effect his son's marriage with the Infanta, he doubted not but that, after so intimate a conjunction, this other point could easily be obtained. The negotiations of that court being commonly dilatory, it was not easy for a prince of so little penetration in business, to distinguish, whether the difficulties, which occurred, were real or effected; and he was surprised, after negotiating five years on so simple a demand, that he was not more advanced than at e Parl. Hift. vol. v. p. 484.

d Kennet, p. 749.

the beginning. A dispensation from Rome was re- C II A P. quisite for the marriage of the Infanta with a protestant prince; and the king of Spain, having undertaken to procure that dispensation, had thereby acquired the means of retarding at pleasure, or offorwarding the marriage, and at the same time of concealing entirely his artifices from the court of England.

In order to remove all obstacles, James dispatched Bigby, foon after created carl of Bristol, as his ambaffader to Philip IV. who had lately fucceeded his father in the crown of Spain. He fecretly employed Gage as his agent at Rome; and finding that the difference of religion was the principal, if not the fole difficulty, which retarded the marriage, he resolved to soften that objection as much as possible. He issued public orders for discharging all popish reculants who were imprisoned; and it was daily apprehended that he would forbid, for the future, the execution of the penal laws enacted against them. For this step, so opposite to the rigid spirit of his subjects, he took care to apologize; and he even endeavoured to ascribe it to his great zeal for the reformed religion. He had been making applications, he faid, to all foreign princes for some indulgence to the distressed protessants; and he was still answered by objections derived from the feverity of English laws against catholics. It might indeed occur to him, that, if the extremity of religious zeal were ever to abate among christian sects, one of them must begin; and nothing would be more honourable for England, than to have led the way in sentiments so wise and moderate.

Not only the religious puritans murmured at this tolerating measure of the king: The lovers of civil liberty were alarmed at so important an exertion of prerogative. But, among other dangerous that time possessed of the dispensing power; at least were in the constant practice of exercising it. Besides, though the royal prerogative in civil matters was then extensive, the princes, during some late reigns, had been accustomed to assume a still greater in ecclesiastical. And the king sailed not to represent the toleration of catholics as a measure entirely of that nature.

Franklyn, p. 69. Ruthworth, vol. i. p. 63.

CHAP. XLIX.

1622

By James's concession in favour of the catholics. he attained his end. The same religious motives which had hitherto rendered the court of Madrid infincere in all the steps taken with regard to the marriage, were now the chief cause of promoting it. its means, it was there hoped the English catholics would for the future enjoy case and indulgence; and the Infanta would be the happy instrument of procuring to the church some tranquillity, after the many severe persecutions which it had hitherto undergone. The earl of Bristol, a minister of vigilance and penetration, and who had formerly opposed alle alliance with catholics f, was now fully convinced of the fincerity of Spain; and he was ready to congratulate the king on the entire completion of his views and projects 5. A daughter of Spain, whom he represents as extremely accomplished, would soon, he faid, arrive in England, and bring with her an immense fortune of two millions of pieces of eight, or fix hundred thousand pounds sterling; a sum four times greater than Spain had ever before given with any princess, and almost equal to all the money which the parliament, during the whole course of this reign, had hitherto granted to the king. But what was of more importance to James's honour and happiness, Bristol considered this match as an infallible prognostic of the palatine's restoration; nor would Philip, he thought, ever have bestowed his sister and f Rushworth, vol. i. p. 292.

so large a fortune under the prospect of entering CHAP.
next day into a war with England. So exact was XLIX. his intelligence, that the most lecret counsels of the Spaniards, he boafts, had never escaped him b; and he found that they had all along confidered the marriage of the Infanta and the restitution of the Palatinate as measures closely connected, or altogether inseparable. However little calculated James's character to extertio vast a concession; however improper the measures which he had pursued for attaining that end; the ambassador could not withstand the plain evidence of facts, by which Philip now demonstrated his fincerity. Perhaps too, like a wife man, he confidered, that reasons of state, which are supposed folely to influence the councils of monarchs, are not always the motives which there predominate; that the milder views of gratitude, honour, friendship, generosity, are frequently-abic among princes, as well as private persons, to counterbalance these selsish considerations; that the justice and moderation of James had been to confpicuous in all these transactions, his reliance on Spain, his considence in her friendship, that he had at last obtained the cordial alliance of that nation, so celebrated for honour and fidelity., Or if politics must still be supposed the ruling motive of all public measures,. the maritime power of England was so considerable, and the Spanish dominions so divided, as might well induce the council of Philip to think that a fincere friendship with the masters of the sea could not be purchased by too great concessions k. And as James, during so many years, had been allured and seduced by hopes and protestations, his people enraged by

We find by private letters between Philip IV. and the Condé Olivarez, shewn by the latter to Buckingham, that the marriage and the restitution of the Palatinate were always considered by the court of Spain as inseparable. See Franklyn, p. 71, 72. Rushworth, vol. i. P. 71, 280, 299, 300. Parl. Hist. vol. vi. p. 66.

* Franklyn, p. 72.

CHAP. delivs and disappointments; it would probably oc-XLIX. that there was now no medium left between the most inveterate hatred and the most intimate alliance between the nations. Not to mention, that, as a new spirit began about this time to animate the councils of France, the friendship of England became every day more necessary to the greatness and fecurity of the Spanish monarch.

All measures being, therefore, agreed on between the parties, nought was wanting but the difpensation from Rome, which might be considered as a mere formality. The king, justified by success, now exulted in his pacific counsels, and boasted of his fuperior fagacity and penetration; when all these flattering prospects were blasted by the temerity of a man, whom he had fondly exalted from a private condition, to be the bane of himself, of his family, and of his people.

Character of Buckingham.

EVER fince the fall of Somerset, Buckingham had governed, with an uncontrolled fway, both the court and nation; and could James's eyes have been opened, he had now full opportunity of obferving how unfit his favourite was for the high station to which he was raised. Some accomplishments of a courtier he possessed: Of every talent of a minister he was utterly destitute. Headstrong in his passions, and incapable equally of prudence and of diffimulation: Sincere from violence rather than candour; expensive from profusion more than generosity: A warm friend, a furious enemy; but without any choice or discernment in either: With these qualities he had early and quickly mounted to the highest rank; and partook at once of the insolence which attends a fortune newly acquired, and the impetuolity which belongs to persons born in high stations, and unacquainted with opposition.

¹ Rushworth, vol. i. p. 66.

Among those who had experienced the arresponde CHAP. of this overgrown favourite, the prince of Mala XLIX. himself had not been entirely spared; and a great ALIX. coldness, if not an enmity, had, for that reason, a taken place between them. Buckingham, desirous of an opportunity, which might connect him with the prince and overcome his aversion, and at the some time envious of the great credit acquired by Bristol in the Spanisa negotiation, bethought himself of an expedient, by which he might at once gratify both these inclinations. He represented to Charles, that persons of his exalted station were peculiarly unfortunate in their marriage, the chief circumstance in life; and commonly received into their arms a bride, unknown to them, to whom they were unknown; not endeared by sympathy, not obliged by service; wooed by treaties alone, by negotiations, by political interest: That however accomplished the Infanta, she must still consider herself as a melancholy victim of state, and could not but think with averlion of that day, when she was to enter the bed of a stranger; and, passing into a foreign country and a new family, bid adieu for ever to her father's house and to her native land: That it was in the prince's power to soften all these rigours, and lay such an obligation on her, as would attach the most indifferent temper, as would warm the coldest affections: That his journey to Madrid would be an unexpected gallantry, which would equal all the fictions of Spanish romance, and suiting the amorous and enterprising character of that nation, must immediately introduce him to the princess under the agreeable character of a devoted lover and daring adventurer: That the negotiations with regard to the Palatinate, which had hitherto languished in the hands of ministers, would quickly be terminated by to illustrious an agent, seconded by the mediation and intreaties of the grateful Infanta: That Spanish VOL. VI, generosity,

CHAP. generofity, moved by that unexampled trust and confidence, would make concessions beyond what could be expected from political views and considerations: And that he would quickly return to the king with the glory of having re-established the unhappy palatine, by the same enterprise which procured him the affections and the person of the Spanish princess m.

THE mind of the young printer replete with candour, was inflamed by these generous and romantic ideas, suggested by Buckingham. He agreed to make application to the king for his approbation. They chose the moment of his kindest and most jovial humour; and more by the earnestness which they expressed, than by the force of their reasons, they obtained a hasty and unguarded consent to their undertaking. And having engaged his promife to keep their purpose secret, they left him, in order to make preparations for the journey.

No fooner was the king alone, than his temper, more cautious than languine, fuggested very different views of the matter, and represented every difficulty and danger which could occur. He reflected, that, however the world might pardon this fally of youth in the prince, they could never forgive himself, who, at his years, and after his experience, could entrust his only son; the heir of his crown, the prop of his age, to the discretion of foreigners, without fo much as providing the frail fecurity of a safe conduct in his favour: That if the Spanish monarch were sincere in his professions, a few morals must finish the treaty of marriage, and bring the Infanta into England; if he were not fincere, the folly was still more egregious of committing the prince into, his hands: That Philip, when possessed of so invaluable a pledge, might well rise in his demands, and impose harder conditions of treaty: And that the temerity of the enterprise CHAP. was so apparent, that the event, how prosperous so XLIX. ever, could not justify it; and if disastrous, it would 1623. render himself infamous to his people and ridiculous to all posterity.

Clarendon, vol. i. p. 11, 12.

TORMENTED with these reflections, as soon as the prince and Buckinghain returned for their dispatches, he informed them of all the reasons which had determined him to change his resolution; and he begged them to defift from so foolish an adventure. The prince received the disappointment with forrowful submission and silent tears: Buckingham prefumed to speak in an imperious tone, which he had ever experienced to be prevalent over his too easy master. He told the king, that nobody for the future would believe any thing he faid, when he retracted so soon the promise so solemnly given; that he plainly discerned this change of resolution to proceed from another breach of his word, in communisating the matter to some rascal, who had furnished him with those pitiful reasons which he had alleged, and he doubted not but he should hereaster know who his counsellor had been; and that if he receded from what he had promifed, it would be such a disobligation to the prince, who had now fet his heart upon the journey, after his majesty's approbation, that he could never forget it, nor forgive any man who had been the cause of it'.

THE king, with great earnestness, fortisted by many oaths, made his apology, by denying that he had communicated the matter to any; and finding himself assailed, as well by the boisterous importunities of Buckingham, as by the warm entreaties of his fon, whose applications had hitherto, on other occasions, been always dutiful, never earnest; he had again the weakness to assent to their purposed n Clarendon, vol. i. p. 14. • Ibid. vol. i. p. 16. K 2 journey.

CHAP, journey. It was agreed that fir Francis Cottington alone, the prince's fecretary, and Endymson Porter, gentleman of his bed-chamber, should accompany them; and the former being at that time in the ante-chamber, he was immediately called in by the king's orders.

JAMES told Cottington, that he had always been an honest man, and therefore he was now to trust him in an affair of the highest importance, which he was not, upon his life, to disclose to any man what-"Cottington," added he, "here is baby "Charles and Stenny," (these ridiculous appellations he usually gave to the prince and Buckingham,) " who have a great mind to go post into "Spain, and fetch home the Infanta: They will have " but two more in their company, and have chosen you for one. What think you of the journey?" Sir Francis, who was a prudent man, and had refided fome years in Spain as the king's agent, was struck with all the obvious objections to fuch an enterprise, and scrupled not to declare them. The king threw himself upon his bed, and cried, I told you this before; and fell into a new pailion and new lamentations, complaining that he was undone, and should lose baby Charles.

The prince showed by his countenance, that he was extremely distaissfied with Cottington's discourse; but Buckingham broke into an open passion against him. The king, he told him, asked him only of the journey, and of the manner of travelling; particulars of which he might be a competent judge, having gone the road so often by post; but that he, without being called to it, had the presumption to give his advice upon matters of state and against his master, which he should repent as long as he lived. A thousand other reproaches, he added, which put the poor king into a new agony in behalf of a servant, who, he foresaw, would suffer for answering him him honestly. Upon which he said with some emo- CHAP. tion, Nay, by God, Stenny, you are much to blame XLIX. for using him fo: He answered me directly to the question which I asked him, and very honestly and wisely; and yet, you know, he said no more than Ltold you beforc he was called in. However, after all this passion on both sides, James renewed his consent; and proper directions were given for the journey. Nor was he now at any loss to discover, that the whole · intrigue was originally contrived by Buckingham, as well as purfued violently by his spirit and impetuofity.

THESE circumstances, which so well characterise the persons, seem to stave been related by Cottington to Jord Clarendon, from whom they are here transcribed; and though minute, are not undeferving of a place in history.

THE prince and Buckingham, with their two attendants, and fir Richard Graham, master of horse 40 Buckingham, passed disguised and undiscovered through France; and they even ventured into a court-ball at Paris; where Charles faw the princess Henrietta, whom he afterwards espoused, and who was at that time in the bloom of youth and beauty. In eleven days after their departure from London, 7th Mar. they arrived at Madrid; and furprised every-body The by a step so unusual among great princes. The journey to Spanish monarch immediately paid Charles a visit, Spain. expressed the utmost gratitude for the considence reposed in him, and made warm protestations of a correspondent confidence and friendship. By the most studious civilities, he showed the respect which he bore to his royal guest. He gave him a golden key, which opened all his apartments, that the prince might, without any introduction, have access to him at all hours: He took the left hand of him on every occasion, except in the apartments assigned to Charles; for there, he said, the prince was at home: Charles was introduced into the palace with the same on their coronation: The council received public received to obey him as the king himfelf: Olivarez too, though a grandee of Spain, who has the right of being covered before his own king, would not put on his hat in the prince's presence?: All the prisons of Spain were thrown open, and all the prisoners received their freedom, as if the event, the most honourable and most fortunate, had happened to the monarchy?: And every sumptuary law with regard to apparel was suspended during Charles's residence in Spain. The Infanta, however, was only shown to her lover in public; the Spanish ideas of decency being so strict, as not to allow of any farther interceurse, till the arrival of the dispensation.

THE point of honour was carried fo far by that generous people, that no attempt was made, on account of the advantage which they had acquired, of imposing any harder conditions of treaty: Their pious zeal only prompted them, on one occasion, to desire more concessions in the religious articles; but, upon the opposition of Bristol, accompanied with fome reproaches, they immediately defitted. The pope, however, hearing of the prince's arrival in Madrid, tacked fome new clauks to the dispensation'; and it became recessary to transpit the articles to London, that the king might ratify them. This treaty, which was made public, confifted of feveral articles, chiefly regarding the exercise of the catholic religion by the Infanta and her household. Nothing could reasonably be sound fault with, except one article, in which the king promised, that the children fliould be educated by the princess, till ten years of age. This condition could not be infifted on, but with a view of leasoning their minds with catholic principles; and though so tender an age seemed a fussicient security against theological prejudices; yet a HAP. the same reason which made the pope insert that article, should have induced the king to reject it.

P Franklyn, p. 73. 9 Idem, p. 74.

⁷ Rushworth, vol. i. p. 77. 5 Idem, vol. i. p. 84,

Besides the public treaty, there were deparate anicles, privately fworn to by the king; in which he promifed to suspend the penal laws enacted against catholics, to procure a repeal of them in parliament, and to grant a toleration for the exercise of the catholic religion in private houses. Great muraturs, we may believe, would have arisen against these articles, had they been made known to the public; since we find it to have been imputed as an enormous crime to the prince, that, having received, about this time, a very civil letter from the pope, he was induced to return a very civil answer.

MEANWHILE Gregory XV. who granted the difpenfation, died, and Urban VIII. was chosen in his place. Upon this event, the nuncio refused to dowver the dispensation, till it should be renewed by Urban; and that crafty pontiff delayed fending a new dispensation, in hopes that, during the prince's residence in Spain, some expedient might be fallen upon to effect his conversion. The king of England, as well as the prince, became impatient. On the first hint, Charles obtained permission to return; and Philip graced his departure with all the circumstances of elaborate civility and respect, which had attended his reception. He even crected a pillar on the spot where they took leave of each other, as a monument of mutual friendship; and the prince, having sworn to the observance of all the articles, entered on his journey, and embarked on board the English sleet at St. Andero..

THE character of Charles, composed of decency, reserve, modesty, sobriety; virtues so agreeable to

^t Franklyn, p. 80. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 89. Kennet, p. 7.
^h Rushworth, vol. i. p. 82. Franklyn, p. 77.

CHAP. the manners of the Spaniards; the unparalleled XLIX confidence which he had reposed in their nation; the romantic gallantry which he had practifed towards their princess; all these circumstances, joined to his youth and advantageous figure, had endeared him to the whole court of Madrid, and had impressed the most favourable ideas of him*. But, in the same proportion that the prines was beloved and esteemed, was Buckingham despised and hated. His behaviour, composed of English familiarity and French vivacity; his fallies of passion, his indecent freedoms with the prince, his diffolute pleafures, his arrogant, impetuous temper, which he neither could nor cared to disguise; qualities like these, could, most of them, be esteemed no-where, but to the Spaniards were the objects of peculiar aversion, They could not conceal their surprise, that such a youth could intrude into a negotiation now conducted to a period by fo accomplished a minister as Bristol, and could assume to himself all the merit of They lamented the Infanta's fate, who must be approached by a man, whose temerity seemed to respect no laws, divine or human. And when they observed, that he had the imprudence to insult the Condé duke of Olivarez, their prime minister, every one, who was ambitious of paying court to the Spanish, became desirous of showing a contempt for the English favourite.

THE duke of Buckingham told Olivarez, that his own attachment to the Spanish nation and to the king of Spain was extreme; that he would contrihute to every measure which could cement the friendship between England and them; and that his peculiar ambition would be to facilitate the prince's marriage with the Infanta. But, he added, with a fincerity equally insolent and indiscreet, With regard to you, sir, in particular, you must not consider me as cour friend, but must ever expect from me all possible C H A P. enmity and opposition. The Condé duke replied, XLIX. with a becoming dignity, that he very willingly accordance terms the favourites parted.

Franklyn, p. 80. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 103.

² Clarendon, vol. i. p. 36. " Ibid. vol. i. p. 101.

BUCKINGHAM, sensible how odious he was become to the Spaniards, and dreading the influence which that nation would naturally acquire after the arrival of the Infanta, resolved to employ all his credit in order to prevent the marriage. By what arguments he could engage the prince to offer such an infult to the Spanish nation, from whom he had met with fuch generous treatment; by what colours he could disguise the ingratitude and imprudence of fuch a meature; these are totally unknown to us. We may only conjecture, that the many unavoidable causes of delay, which had so long prevented ' the arrival of the dispensation, had afforded to Buckingham a pretence for throwing on the Spaniards •the imputation of influccrity in the whole treaty. It also appears, that his impetuous and domineering character had acquired, what it ever after maintained, a total ascendant over the gentle and modest temper of Charles, and, when the prince left Madrid, he was firmly determined, notwithstanding all his professions, to break off the treaty with Spain.

It is not likely that Buckingham prevailed so easily with James to abandon a project, which, during so many years, had been the object of all his wishes, and which he had now unexpectedly conducted to a happy period. A rupture with Spain, the loss of two millions, were prospects little agreeable to this pacific and indigent monarch. But, sinding his only son bent against a match, which had always been opposed by his people and his parliament, he yielded to the difficulties which he had not a Rushworth, vol. i. p. 103. Clarendon, vol. i. p. 37.

b Hacket's Life of Williams.

CHAP. courage or strength of mind sufficient to overcome. The prince therefore, and Buckingham, on their research, at London, assumed entirely the direction of the negotiation, and it was their business to seek for pretences, by which they could give a colour to their intended breach of treaty.

Though the restitution of the Palatinate had ever been confidered by James as a natural or necessary consequence of the Spanish alliance, he had always forbidden his ministers to infist on it as a preliminary article to the conclusion of the marriage treaty. He considered, that this principality was now in the hands of the emperor and the duke of Bavaria; and that it was no longer in the king of Spain's power, by a fingle stroke of his pen, to restore it to its ancient master. The strict alliance of Spain with these princes would engage Philip, he thought, to soften so disagreeable a demand by every art of negotiation; and many articles must of necessity be adjusted, before such an important point could be. effected. It was sufficient, in James's opinion, if the fincerity of the Spanish court could, for the present, be ascertained; and, dreading farther delays of the marriage, so long wished for, he was resolved to trust the palatine's full restoration to the event of future counsels and deliberations c.

This whole fystem of negotiation Buckingham now reversed; and he overturned every supposition upon which the treaty had hitherto been conducted. After many fruitless artifices were employed to delay or prevent the espousals, Bristol received positive orders not to deliver the proxy, which had been lest in his hands, or to finish the marriage, till security were given for the full restitution of the Palatinate. Philip understood this language. He had been acquainted with the disgust received by Buckingham; and deeming him a man capable of sacrificing to c Parl. Hist. vol. vi. p. 57.

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 105. Kennet, p. 776.

his own ungovernable passions, the greatest interests CHAP. of his master and of his country, he had expected, XLIX. that the unbounded credit of that favourite would be ... 1623. employed to embroil the two nations. Determined, Marriage treaty however, to throw the blame of the rupture entirely broken. on the English, he delivered into Bristol's hand a written promise, by which he bound himself to procure the restoration of the Palatinate, either by persuasion, or by every other possible means; and, when he found that this concession gave no satisfaction, he ordered the Infanta to lay aside the title of princess of Wales, which she bore after the arrival of the dispensation from Rome, and to drop the study of the English language. And thinking that fuch rash counsels, as now governed the court of England, would not stop at the breach of the marriage treaty, he ordered preparations for war immediately to be made throughout all his dominions 1.

Thus James, having, by means inexplicable from the ordinary rules of politics, conducted so near an honourable period, the marriage of his son, and the restoration of his son-in-law, failed at last of his purpose, by means equally unaccountable.

Bur, though the expedients already used by Buckingham were sufficiently inglorious both for himself and for the nation, it was necessary for him, ere he could sully effect his purpose, to employ artiaces still more dishonourable.

The king, having broken with Spain, was obliged to concert new measures; and, without the assistance of parliament, no effectual step of any hind could be taken. The benevolence, which, during the interval, had been rigorously exacted for recovering the Palatinate, though levied for so popular an end, had procured to the king less money

Franklyn, p. 80. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 112.

Rashworth, vol. i. p. 114.

1624.

1624. A parliament.

z9th Feb

CHAP. than ill-will from his subjects . Whatever discouragements, therefore, he might receive from his ill agreement with former parliaments, there was a necessity of summoning once more this assembly: And it might be hoped, that the Spanish alliance, which gave such umbrage, being abandoned, the commons would now be better satisfied with the king's administration. In his speech to the houses, James dropped some hints of his cause of complaint against Spain; and he graciously condescended to ask the advice of parliament, which he had ever before rejected, with regard to the conduct of so important an affair as his son's marriage h. Buckingham delivered, to a committee of lords and commons, a long narrative, which he pretended to be true and complete, of every step taken in the negotiations with Philip: But partly by the suppression of some facts, partly by the false colouring laid on others, this narrative was calculated entirely to mislead the parliament, and to throw on the court of Spain the reproach of artifice and infincerity. faid that, after many years negotiation, the king found not himself any nearer his purpose; and that Bristol had never brought the treaty beyond general professions and declarations. That the prince, doubting the good intentions of Spain, resolved at last to take a journey to Madrid, and put the matter to the utmost trial: That he there found fuch artificial dealing as made him conclude all the steps taken towards the marriage to be false and de-That the restitution of the Palatinate, ceitful:

Franklyn, p. 79. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 115. Kennet, p. 778.

To show by what violent measures benevolences were usually raised, Johnstone tells us, in his Rerum Britannicarum bistoria, that Barnes, a citizen of London, was the first who retufed to contribute any thing; upon which the treatmer fent him word, that he must immediately prepare himself to carry, by pott, a dispatch into Ireland. The citizen was glad to make his peace, by paying a hundred pounds; and no one durst after. wards resuse the benevolence required. See farther, Coke, p. 80.

which had ever been regarded by the king as an CHAP. effential preliminary, was not feriously intended by Spain: And that, after enduring much bad usage, 1624. the prince was obliged to return to England, without any hopes, either of obtaining the Infanta, or of restoring the elector palatine h.

This narrative, which, confidering the importance of the occasion, and the solemnity of that assembly to which it was delivered, deserves great blame, was yet vouched for truth by the prince of Wales, who was present; and the king himself lent it, indirectly, his authority, by telling the parliament that it was by his orders Bukingham laid the whole affair before them. The conduct of these princes it is difficult fully to excuse. It is in vain to plead the youth and inexperience of Charles; unless his inexperience and youth, as is probable 1, if not certain, really led him into error, and made him swallow all the falsities of Buckingham. And though the king was here hurried from his own measures by the impeluosity of others; nothing should have induced him to prostitute his character, and seem to vouch the impostures, at least false colourings, of his favourite, of which he had so good reason to entertain I suspicion k.

Buckingham's narrative, however artfully difguised, contained it many contradictory circumstances, as were sufficient to open the eyes of all reasonable men; but it concurred so well with the passions and prejudices of the parliament, that no scruple was made of immediately adopting it. Charmed with having obtained at length the op-

Paul. Hist. vol. vi, p. 75.

h Franklyn, p. 89, 90, 91, &c. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 119, 120, &c. Parl. Hist. vol. vi. p. 20, 21, &c.

See note [M] at the end of the volume.

k It must, however, he confessed, that the king afterwards warned the house not to take Buckingham's narrative for his, though it was hid before them by his order. Parl. Hist. vol. vi. p. 104. James was probably ashamed to have been carried so tar by his favourite.

CHAP. portunity, so long wished for, of going to war with papists, they little thought of future consequences; but immediately advised the king to break off both. treaties with Spain, as well that which regarded the marriage, as that for the restitution of the Palatinate. The people, ever greedy of war till they fuffer by it, displayed their triumph at these violent measures by public bonfires and rejoicings, and by infults on the Spanish ministers. Buckingiran was now the favourite of the public, and of the parlia-. Sir Edward Coke, in the house of commons, called him the faviour of the nation. Every place resounded with his praises. And he himself, intoxicated by a popularity which he enjoyed so little time, and which he so ill deserved, violated all duty to his indulgent master, and entered into cabals with the puritanical members, who had ever opposed the royal authority. He even encouraged schemes for abolishing the order of bishops, and selling the dean and chapter lands, in order to defray the expences of a Spanish war. And the king, though he still enter-tained projects for temporising, and for forming an accommodation with Spain, was fo borne down by the torrent of popular prejudiques, conducted and increased by Buckingham, that he was at last obliged, in a speech to parliament, to declare in favour of hostile measures, if they would engage to support him . Doubts of their fince ity in this respect, doubts which the event showed not to be illgrounded, had probably been one cause of his former pacific and dilatory measures.

In his speech on this occasion, the king began with lamenting his own unhappiness, that, having so long valued himself on the epithet of the pacific monarch, he should now, in his old age, be obliged to exchange the bleffings of peace for the inevitable CHAP. calamities of war. He represented to them the immenle and continued expence requisite for military armaments; and betides supplies, from time to time, as they should become necessary, he demanded a vote of fix subsidies and twelve lifteenthes as a proper stock before the commencement of hostilities. He told them of his intolcrable debts, chiefly contracted by she sums remitted to the Palatinate ?; but he added, that he did not infift on any supply ibr his own relief, and that it was sufficient for him, if the honour and fecurity of the public were provided for. To remove all fuspicion, he, who had ever strenuously maintained his prerogative, and who had even extended it into some points esteemed doubtful, now made an imprudent concession, of which the confequences might have proved fatal to_ royal authority: He voluntarily offered, that the money voted should be paid to a committee of parliament, and should be islated by them, without being intrusted to his management 4. The commons willingly accepted of this concession, so unusual in an English monarch; they voted him only three subsidies and three fifteenths': And they took no notice of the complaints which he made of his own wants and necessities.

Franklyn, p. 98. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 128. Parl. Hist. vol. vi. • Franklyn, p. 94, 95. De Clarendon, vol. i. p. 6. Ruthworth, vol. i. p. 129, 130.

ADVANTAGE was also taken of the present good agreement between the king and parliament, in order to pass the bill against monopolies, which had formerly been encouraged by the king, but which had failed by the rupture between him and the last house of commons. This bill was conceived in such terms as to render it merely declaratory; and all monopolies were condemned as contrary to law and to the known liberties of the people. It was there supposed, that every subject of England had entire

P. 327. Less than 300,000 pounds.

Q Rushworth, vol. i.

CHAP. por to dispose of his own actions, provided he did XLIX. To any of his fellow-subjects; and that no prerogative of the king, no power of any magistrate, nothing but the authority alone of laws, could reof this noble principle into all its natural confequences, has at last, through many contests, produced that fingular and happy government which we enjoy at present.

THE house of commons also corroboxited; by a new precedent, the important power of imperchament, which, two years before, they had exercised in the case of chancellor Bacon, and which had lain dormant for near two centuries, except when they ferved as instruments of royal vengeance. The earl of Middlesex had been raised, by Buckingham's interest, from the rank of a London merchant, to be treasurer of England; and, by his activity and address, seemed not unworthy of that preferment. But, as he incurred the displeasure of his patron, by scrupling or refusing some demands of money, during the prince's residence in Spain, that favourite vowed revenge, and employed all his credit among the commons to procure an impeachment of the treasurer. The king was extenely distatisfied with this measure, and prophesied to the prince and duke, that they would live to lave their fill of parliamentary profecutions. In i speech to the parliament, he endeavoured to ologise for Middlesex, and to soften the accusaion against him . The charge, however, was full maintained by the commons; and the treasurer was found guilty by the peers, though the misdemeanors proved against him were neither numerous nor important. The accepting of two presents of five hundred pounds a-piece, for passing two patents, was the article of

See note [O] at the end of the volume.

P. 223.

Pail. Hist. vol. vi. p. 19.

greatest

greatest weight. His sentence was, to be the CHAP. 50,000 pounds for the king's use, and to line XLIX. the other penalties formerly inflicted upon Bacon 1624. The fine was afterwards remitted by the prince when he mounted the throne.

This session an address was also made very agreeable to the king, craving the severe execution of the laws against catholics. His answer was gracious and condescending "; though he declared against persecution, as being an improper measure for the Suppression of any religion, according to the received maxim, That the blood of the martyrs was the feed of the church. He also condemned an entire indulgence of the catholics; and seemed to represent a middle course as the most humane and most politic. He went so far as even to affirm, with an oath, that he never had entertained any thoughts of granting a toleration to these religionists *. The liberty of exercising their worship in private houses, which he had secretly agreed to in the Spanish treaty, did not appear to him deserving that name; and it was probably by means of this explication, he thought that he had faved his ho-And as Buckingham, in his narrative, conlessed that the king had agreed to a temporary suspension of the popul laws against the catholics, which he distinguished from a toleration, a term at that time extremely oflious, James naturally deemed his meaning to be sufficiently explained, and feared not any reproach of fall haod or duplicity, on account of this affeveration. After all these trans- 29th May. actions, the parliament was prorogued by the king, who let fall some hints, though in gentle terms, of The sense which he entertained of their unkindness, in not supplying his necessities 2.

L

w Franklyn, p. 201, 103. . F Parl. Hift. vol. vi. p. 37. Vol. VI.

^{*} See farther, Franklyn, p. 87.

² Franklyn, p. 103.

JAMES,

1624.

CHAP. JAMES, unable to result so strong a combination as that of his people, his parliament, his fon, and his favourité, had been compelled to embrace meafures, for which, from temper as well as judgment, he had ever entertained a most settled aversion. Though he dissembled his resentment, he began to estrange himself from Buckingham, to whom he ascribed all those violent counsels, and whom he confidered as the author both of the prince of ourney to Spain, and of the breach of the marking treaty. The arrival of Bristol he impatiently long the for; and it was by the affiltance of that minister, whose wisdom he respected, and whose views he approved, that he hoped in time to extricate himself from his present difficulties.

Return of Bristal.

During the prince's abode in Spain, that able -negotiator had ever opposed, though unsuccessfully, to the impetuous measures suggested by Buckingham, his own wife and well-tempered counfels. After Charles's departure, he still, upon the first appearance of a change of resolution, interposed his advice, and strenuously insisted on the sincerity of the Spaniards in the conduct of the treaty, as well at the advantages which England must reap from the completion of it. Enraged to find that his successful labours should be rendered abortive by the levities and caprices of an infelent minion, he would understand no hints; and nothing but express orders from his master could explige him to make that demand which he was Tehsible must put a final period to the treaty. He was not therefore surprised to hear that Buckingham had declared himself his open enemy, and, on all occasions, had thrown out many violent reflections against him.

Norming could be of greater consequence to Buckingham, than to keep Bristol at a distance both from the king and the parliament; left the power of truth, enforced by so well-informed a speaker,

speaker, should open scenes, which were but suspected CHAP. by the former, and of which the latter had as yet entertained no manner of jealousy. He applied therefore to James, whose weakness, disguised to himself under the appearance of finesse and dissimulation, was now become absolutely incurable. A warrant for fending Bristol to the Tower was issued immediately upon his arrival in England b; and though he was loon eleased from confinement, yet orders were kallied him from the king, to retire to his contry feat, and to abstain from all attendance in parliament. He obeyed; but loudly demanded an opportunity of justifying himself, and of laying his whole conduct before his master. On all occasions he protested his innocence, and threw on his enemy the blame of every miscarriage. Buckingham, and, at his instigation, the prince, declared, that they would be reconciled to Bristol, if he would but acknowledge his errors and ill-conduct: But the spirited nobleman, jealous of his honour, refused to buy famour at so high a price. James had the equity to fay, that the infifting on that condition was a strain of unexampled tyranny: But Buckingham scrupled not to affert with his usual presumption, that neither the king, the prince, nor himself, were as yet satisfied of Brisbl's innocence .

WHILE the attachment of the prince to Buckingham, while the limidity of James, or the thame of changing his avourite, kept the whole court in awe; the Spanish ambassador, Inoiosa, endeavoured to open the king's eyes, and to cure his fears by instilling greater fears into him. He privately slipped into his hand a paper, and gave, him a fignal to read it alone. He there told him, that he was as much a prisoner at London as ever Francis I. was at Madrid; that the prince and ^{*} Rushworth, vol.i. p. 145. • C Id. vol. i. p. 239.

٤, ٠

1524.

CHAP. Buckingham had conspired together, and had the whole court at their devotion; that cabals among the popular leaders in parliament were carrying on to the extreme prejudice of his authority; that the project was to confine him to some of his hunting feats, and to commit the whole administration to Charles; and that it was hecessary for him, by one vigorous effort, to vindicate his authority, and to punish those who had so long and so line had bused his friendship and beneficence .

What credit James gave to this representation does not appear. He only discovered some faint fymptoms, which he instantly retracted, of disfatisfaction with Buckingham. All his public measures, and all the alliances into which he entered, were founded on the fystem of enmity to the Austrian family, and of war to be carried on for the recovery of the Palatinate.

THE states of the United Provinces were, at this time, governed by Maurice; and that aspiring prince, sensible that his credit would languish during peace, had, on the expiration of the twelve years truce, renewed the war with the Spanish monarchy. His great capacity in the military art would have compensated the inferiority of his forces, had not the Spanish armies been commanded by Spinola, a general equally renowned for conduct, and more celebrated for enterprise and activity. In such a situation, nothing could we more welcome to the republic than the prespect of a rupture between James and the catholic king; and they flattered themselves, as well from the natural union of interests between them and England, as from the influence of the present conjuncture, that pswerful fuccours would foon march to their relief. Accordingly, an army of fix thousand men was levied in England,

Rupture with Spain.

[&]amp; Rushworth, vol. i. p. 144. Hacket's Life of Williams. Coke, England, and fent over to Holland, commanded by CHAP. four young hoblemen, Essex, Oxford, Southampton, XLIX. and Willoughby, who were ambitious of distinguishing themselves in so popular a cause, and of acquiring military experience under so renowned a captain as Maurice.

It night reasonably have been expected, that, as Treaty religious zeal had made the recovery of the Pala- France. tinate abrear a point of fuch vast importance in Englandir. The same effect must have been produced in while, by the force merely of political views and considerations. While that principality remained in the hands of the house of Austria, the French dominions were furrounded on all fides by the poffeffions of that ambitious family, and might be invaded by superior forces from every quarter. It concerned the king of France, therefore, to prevent the peaceable establishment of the emperor in his new conquests; and both by the situation and greater power of his state, he was much better enabled than James to give fuccour to the distressed palatine c. But though their views elcaped not Louis, nor cardinal Richlieu, who now began to acquire an ascendant in the French court; that minister was determined to pave the way for his enterprifes by first subduing the Hugonots, and thence to proceed, by mature counicls, to humble the house of Austria. The prospect, however, of a conjuntion with England was presently embraced, and alkimaginable encouragement was given to every proposal for conciliating a marriage between Charles and the princess Henrietta.

Notwithstanding the sensible experience; which James might have acquired, of the unfurmountable antipathy entertained by his subjects against an alliance with catholics, he still persevered

See Collection of State Papers by the Earl of Clarendon, p. 393.

CHAP. in the opinion, that his fon would be degraded by receiving into his bed a princess of less than royal extraction. After the rupture, therefore, with Spain, nothing remained but an alliance with France; and to that court he immediately applied himself. The same allurements had not here place, which had so long entangled him in the Spanish negotiation: The portion promised was neich inferior; and the peaceable restoration of the palatragically not thence be expected. But James was affait lest his fon should be altogether disappointed of a bride; and therefore, as foon as the French king demanded, for the honour of his crown, the same terms which had been granted to the Spanish, he was prevailed with to comply. And as the prince, during his abode in Spain, had given a verbal promise to allow the Infanta the education of her children till the age of thirteen, this article was here inserted in the treaty; and to that imprudence is generally imputed the present distressed condition of his pesterity. The court of England, however, it must be confessed, always pretended, even in their memorials to the French court, that all the favourable conditions granted to the catholics, were inferted in the marriage treaty merely to please the pope, and that their strict execution was, by an agreement with France, Secretly dispensed with ".

As much as the conclusion of the marriage treaty was acceptable to the king, as much were all the military enterprises disagreeable, both from the extreme difficulty of the undertaking in which he was engaged, and from his own incapacity for such a fcene of action.

DURING the Spanish negotiation, Heidelberg and Manheim had been taken by the Imperial forces; and See note [P] at the end of Rushworth, vol. i. p. 752. the volume.

Frankendale, though the garrison was entirely Eng. CHAP. lish, was closely belieged by them. After reiterated XLIX. remonstrances from James, Spain interposed, and procured a suspension of arms during eighteen months. But as Frankendale was the only place of Frederic's ancient dominions which was still in his hands, Ferdinand, desizees of withdrawing his forces from the Palanuate, and of leaving that state in fectivity, was unwilling that so important a fortress showed remain in the possession of the enemy. To Fomise all differences, it was agreed to sequestrate it into the hands of the Infanta as a neutral person; upon condition that, after the expiration of the truce, it should be delivered to Frederic; though peace should not, at that time, be concluded between him and Ferdinand. After the unexpected rupture with Spain, the Infanta, when James demanded the execution of the treaty, offered him peaceable possession of Frankendale, and even promiled a fafe-conduct for the garrison through the Spanin Netherlands: But there was some territory of the empire interposed between her state and the Palatinate; and for passage over that territory, no terms were stipulated k. By this chicane, which certainly had not been employed if amity with Spain had been preserved, the palatine was totally dispossession di

THE English nation, however, and James's warlike council, were not discouraged. It was still determined to re-conquer the Palatinate; a state lying in the midst of Germany, possessed entirely by the emperor and duke of Bavaria, furreunded by potent enemies, and cut off from all communication with England. Count Mansfeldt was taken Mansinto pay and an English army of twelve thousand feldes ex-soot and two hundred horse was levied by a general

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 74.

[🗫] Idem, ibid. p. 151.

1624.

CHAP. preis throughout the kingdom. During the negotiation with France, vast promises had been made, though in general terms, by the French ministry; not only that a free passage should be granted to the English troops, but that powerful succours should also join them in their march towards the Palatinate. In England, all these prosecons were hastily interpreted to be positive engagements: The troops under Mansfeldt's command were entracket at December. Dover; but, upon sailing over to Calais, for it in orders yet arrived for their admission. After waster in vain during some time, they were obliged to fail towards Zealand; where it had also been neglected to concert proper measures for their disembarkation; and some scruples arose among the States on account of the scarcity of provisions. Meanwhile a pestilential distemper creeped in among the English forces, so long cooped up in narrow vessels. Half the army died while on board; and the other half, weakened by fickness, appeared too small a body to march into the Palatinate. And thus ended this ill-concerted and fruitless expedition; the only difafter which happened to England during the prosperous and pacific reign of James.

3625

THAT reign was now drawing towards a conclusion. With peace so successfully cultivated, and so passionately loved by this morarch, his life also terminated. This spring he was seized with a tertian ague; and, when encouraged by his courtiers with the common proverb, that such a listemper, during that feason, was health for a king, he replied, that the preverb was meant of a young king. After some fits, he found himself extremely weakened, and fent for the prince, whom he exhorted to bear a tender affection for his wife, but to preserve a constancy in religion; to protect the church of England;

Franklyn, p. 204. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 254. Dugdale, p. 24. and and to extend his care towards the unhappy family CHAP. of the palatine "., With decency and charage he prepared himself for his end; and he expired on the 27th of March, after a reign over England of Death of twenty-two years and some days; and in the fiftyninth year of his age. His reign over Scotland was almost of equal duration with his life. In all history, it would be discust to find a reign less illustrious, yet more inspotted and unblemished, than that of Jaraes in both kingdoms.

the king.

of prince, so little enterprising and so inossensive, His chawas ever so much exposed to the opposite extremes ratter. of calumny and flattery, of satire and panegyric. And the factions, which began in his time, being still continued, have made his character be as much disputed to this day, as is commonly that of princes who are our contemporaries. Many virtues, how, ever, it must be owned, he was possessed of; but fcarce any of them pure, or free from the contagion of the neighbouring vices. His generosity bordered on profusion, his learning on pedantry, his pacific disposition on pusillanimity, his wisdom on cunning, his friendship on light fancy and boyish fondness. While he imagined that he was only maintaining his own authority, he may perhaps be suspected, in a few of his actions, and still more of his pretensions, to have somewhat encroached on the liberties of his people: While he endeavoured, by an exact neutrality, to acquire the good-will of all his neighbours, he was able to preserve fully the esteem and regard of none. His capacity was considerable; but sitter to discourse on general maxims than to tenduct any intricate business: His intentions were just; but more adapted to the conduct of private life, than to the government of kingdoms. Awkward in his person and ungainly in his manners, he was ill qualified to m Rushworth, vol. i. p. 155.

1625.

CHAP. command respect; partial and undiscerning in his affections he was little fitted to acquire general love. Of a feeble temper more than of a frail judgment: Exposed to our ridicule from his vanity; but exempt from our hatred by his freedom from pride and arrogance. And upon the whole, it may be pronounced of his character that all his qualities were fullied with weakness and einhellished by humanity. Of political courage he certainly was destitute; and thence chiefly is derived the dirong prejudice which prevails against his personal bravel An inference, however, which must be owned, from general experience, to be extremely fallacious.

HE was only once married, to Anne of Denmark, who died on the 3d of March 1619, in the fortyfifth year of her age; a woman eminent neither for her vices nor her virtues. She loved shows and expensive amusements; but possessed little taste in her pleasures. A great comet appeared about the time of her death; and the vulgar esteemed it the prognostic of that event. So considerable in diest eyes are even the most insignificant princes.

HE left only one son, Charles, then in the twentyfifth year of his age; and one daughter, Elizabeth, married to the elector palatine, She was aged twenty-nine years. Those alone remained of six legitimate children born to him. He never had any illegitimate; and he never discovered any tendency, even the smallest, towards a passion for any mistress.

THE archbishops of Canterbury, during this reign, were Whitgift, who died in 1604; Bancroft, in 7610; Abbot, who survived the king. The chancellors, lord Ellesmore, who resigned in 1617; Bacon was first lord keeper till 1619; then was created chancellor, and was displaced in 1621; Williams, bishop of Lincoln, was created lord keeper in his place. The high treasurers were, the earl of Dorset, who died in 1609; the earl of

13

Salisbury,

1625,

Salisbury, in 1612; the earl of Suffolk, fined and CHAP. displaced for bribery in 1618; lord Marabille, refigned in 1621; the earl of Middlesex displaced in 1624; the earl of Marlborough succeeded. The lord admirals were, the earl of Nottingham, who resigned in 1618; the earl, afterwards duke of Buckingham., The recretaries of state were, the earl of Salisbury, sir Ralph Winwood, Nanton, Calvert, lord Conway, fir Albertus Moreton.

parliament of this reign, were seventy-eight temporal peers. The numbers in the first parliament of Charles were ninety-seven. Consequently James, during that period, created nineteen new pecrages above those that expired.

THE house of commons, in the first parliament of this reign, confifted of four hundred and fixty-sever. members It appears, that four boroughs revived their charters, which they had formerly neglected. And as the first parliament of Charles consisted of four hundred and ninety-four members, we may infer that James created ten new boroughs.

APPENDIX

TO THE

RFIGN OF JAMES I.*

Civil government of England during this period-Ecclesiastical government—Manners—Finances --- Navy --- Commerce --- Manufactures ---Colonies—Learning and arts.

a pause; and to take a survey of the state of the kingdom with regard to government, manners, finances, arms, trade, learning. Where a just notion is not formed of these particulars, history can be little instructive, and often will not be intelligible.

We may fafely pronounce, that the English go- Civil government, at the accession of the Scottish line, was vernment much more arbitrary than it is at present; the pre- of Engrogative less limited, the liberties of the subject less accurately defined and secured. Without mentioning other particulars, the courts alone of high com-million '

^{*} This history of the house of Stuart was written and published by the author-solore the history of the house of Tudor. Hence it happens that some passages, particularly in the present Appendix, may feem to be repetitions of what was formerly delivered in the reign of Elizabeth. The author, in order to obviate this objection, has cancelled some few passages in the foregoing chapters.

Appendix mission and star-chamber were sufficient to lay the whole kingdom at the mercy of the prince.

THE court of high commission had been erected by Elizabeth, in consequence of an act of parliament, passed in the beginning of her reign: By this act, it was thought proper, during the great revolution of religion, to arm the sovereign with full powers, in order to discourage and suppless supposition. appeals from the inferior ecclesiastical courts were carried before the high commission; and, of consequence, the whole life and doctrine of the clerge lay directly under its inspection. Every breach of the act of uniformity, every refusal of the ceremonies, was cognizable in this court; and during the reign of Elizabeth, had been punished by deprivation, by fine, confiscation, and imprisonment. James contented himself with the gentler penalty of deprivation; nor was that punishment inflicted with rigour on every offender. Archbishop Spotswood tells us, that he was informed by Bancroft, the primate, several years after the king's accession, that were above forty-five clergymen had then been deprived. All the catholics too were liable to be punished by this court, if they exercised any act of their religion, or fent abroad their children or other relations, to receive that education which they could not procure them in their own country. Popish priests were thrown into prison, and might be delivered over to the law, which punished them with death; though that severity had been sparingly exercised by Elizabeth, and never almost by James. In a word, that liberty of conscience, which we so highly and so justly value at present, was totally suppressed; and no exercise of any religion, but the established, was permitted throughout the kingdom. Any word or writing, which tended towards herefy or Ichifm, was punishable by the high commissioners or any three of them: They alone were judges what expressions had that tendency: They proceeded not by information, Appendix. but upon rumour, suspicion, or according to their discretion: They administered an oath, by which the party cited before them was bound to answer any question which should be propounded to him. Whoever refused this oath, though he pleaded everso justly, that he might thereby be brought to accuse himself, or insticarest friend, was punishable by imprisonmery: And in short, an inquisitofial tribunal, with all its terrors and iniquities, was erected in the Migdom. Full discretionary powers were bestowed with regard to the inquiry, trial, sentence, and penalty inflicted; excepting only that corporal punishments were restrained By that patent of the prince, which erected the court, not by the act of parliament which empowered him. By reason of the uncertain limits which feparate ecclesiastical from civil causes, all accusations of adultery and incest were tried by the court of high commission; and every complaint of wives against their husbands was there camined and discussed. On like pretences, every cause which regarded conscience, that is, every cause could have been brought under their jurisdiction.

But there was a sufficient reason, why the king would not be solicitous to stretch the jurisdiction of this court: The star-chamber possessed the same authority in civil matters; and its methods of proceeding were equally arbitrary and unlimited. The origin of this court was derived from the most remote antiquity, though it is pretended, that its power had first been carried to the greatest-height by Henry VII. In all times, however, it is confessed,

Rush worth vol. ii. p. 473. In Chambers's case it was the unanimous opinion of the court of King's Bench, that the court of starchamber was not derived from the statute of Henry VII. but was a court many years before, and one of the most high and honomable courts of justice. See Coke's Rep. term Mich. 5 Car. I. See further Camden's Brit. vol. i. Introd. p. $54. edit. of Gibson.

Appendix. felled, it enjoyed authority; and at no time was its authority circumscribed, or method of proceeding directed by any law or statute.

WE have had already, or shall have sufficient " occasion, during the course of this history, to mention the dispensing power, the power of imprisonment, of exacting loans q and benevolence, of pressing and quartering soldiers, of altering the customs, of erecting monopolies. These branches of power, if not directly opposite to the principle of all free government, must, at least, be acknowledged dangerous to freedom in a monarchical constitution, where an eternal jealousy must be preserved against the sovereign, and no discretionary powers must ever be entrusted to him, by which the property or personal liberty of any subject can be affected. The kings of England, however, had almost constantly exercised these powers; and if, on any occasion, the prince had been obliged to submit to laws enacted against them, he had ever, in practice, eluded these laws, and returned to the same arbitrary administration. During almost three centuries before the accession of James, the regal authority, in all these particulars, had never once been called in queftion.

WE may also observe, that the principles in general, which prevailed during that age, were so favourable to monarchy, that they bestowed on it an authority almost absolute and unlimited, sacred and indefeafible.

THE meetings of parliament were so precarious; their selliens so short, compared to the vacation; that, when men's eyes were turned upwards in search of sovereign power, the princt alone was apt to strike them as the only permanent magistrate, invested with the whole majesty and authority of the state.

⁹ During several centuries, no reign had passed without some forced an from the subject, The

The great complaisance too of parliaments during Appendix. so long a period, had extremely degraded and ob-scured those assemblies; and as all instances of opposition to prerogative must have been drawn from a remote age, they were unknown to a great many, and had the less authority even with those who were acquainted with them. These examples, besides, of liberty had commonly in ancient times been accompanied with fuch circumstances of violence, convulsion, civil war, and disorder, that they prefented but a disagreeable idea to the inquisitive part of the people, and afforded fmall inducement to renew fuch difmal feenes. By a great many, therefore, monarchy, simple and unmixed, was conceived to be the government of England; and those popular affemblies were supposed to form only the ornament of the fabric, without being in any degree esfential to its being and existence. The prerogative of the crown was represented by lawyers as something real and durable; like those eternal essences of the schools which no time or force could alter. The fanction of religion was by divines called in aid; and the monarch of heaven was supposed to be interested in supporting the authority of his earthly vicegerent. And though it is pretended that these doctrines were more openly inculcated and more strenuously insisted on during the reign of the Stuarts, they were not then invented; and were only found by the court to be more necessary at that period, by reason of the opposite doctrines which began to be promulgated by the puritanical party.

In consequence of these exalted ideas of kingly authority, the prerogative, besides the articles of jurisdiction sounded on precedent, was by many supposed to possess an inexhaustible sund of latent powers, which might be exerted on any emergence. In every government, necessity, when real, super-

See note [Q] at the end of the volume.
See note [R] at the end of the volume.

Appendix. sedes all laws and levels all limitations: But in the English government, convenience alone was conceived to authorife any extraordinary act of regal power, and to render it obligatory on the people. Hence the strict obedience required to proclamations, during all periods of the English history; and if James has incurred bleme on account of his edicts, it is only because he too frequently issued them at a time when they began to be less regarded, not because he sirst assumed or extended to an unusual degree that exercise of authority. maxims in a parallel case, the following is a pretty remarkable instance.

Quien Elizabeth had appointed commissioners for the inspection of prisons, and had believed on them full diferedonary powers to adjust all differences between prisoners and their exeditors, to compound debts; and to give liberty to fuch debtors as they found honest and insolvent. From the uncertain and undefined nature of the English constitution, doubts fprang up in many, that this committion was contrary to law; and it was reprefensed in that light to james. He forebore therefore renewing the commission till the sisteenth of-his reign; when complaints role to high, with regard to the abuses practifed in prifons, that he thought himself obliged to overcome his feruples, and to appoint new commitfloriers invelted with the lame discretionary powers which Elizabeth had formerly conferred '.

Upon the whole, we must conceive that monarchy, on the accession of the house of Stuart, was pollefied of a very extensive authority: An authority, in the judgment of all, not exactly limited; in the judgment of some, not limitable. the fame time, this authority was founded merely on the opinion of the people, influenced by ancient precedent and example. It was not supported either by money or by force of arms. And, for this rea- Appendix. ion, we need not wonder that the princes of that line were so extremely jealous of their prerogative; being sensible that, when those claims were ravished from them, they possessed no influence by which they could maintain their dignity, or support the laws. By the changes which have fince been introduced, the liberty and independence of individuals has been jendered much more full, entire, and feerre; that of the public more uncomain and preearlous. And it fectus a necessary, though perhaps a melercholy truth, that in every government, the magillrate must either possess a large revenue and a military force, or enjoy some discretionary powers, in order to execute the lays and support his own audority.

[&]quot; Kynier, tom. xviii. p. 117. 594.

With we had occuben to remark in he many in- Eccleballitiances, the bigotty which prevailed in that age, calgoremthat we can look for toleration among the differon feets. Two bians, under the title of heretics, allre panified by fire during this period; and no our regn lineraths relevantion had been free from like barbarities. Stowe fay, that thefe Arians were silicred their pardon at the flake, if they would merit it by a reconsistion. A righnin who called himfelf the Holy Choft was, without any indulgence for his frenzy, condemned to the fame punillment. Twenty pounds a month could by law be levied on every one who from anted not the effabliffied worthip. This rigorous law, however, had one indulgent claufe, that the fines exacted thould not exceed two-thirds of the yearly income of the person. It had been usual for Elizabeth to allow those penalties to run on for several years; and to levy them all at once; to the utter ruin of fuch catholics as had incurred her displeasure. James was more humane in this, as in every other respect. The Puritans formed a fect which secretly lurked in the church, but pretended not to any separate worship

.M 2

Appendix. ship or discipline. An attempt of that kind would have been univerfally regarded as the most unpardonable enormity. And had the king been disposed to grant the Puritans a full toleration for a separate exercise of their religion, it is certain, from the spirit of the times, that this sect itself would have despised and hated him for it, and would have reproached him with lukewarmness and indifference in the cause of religion. They maintained, that they themselves were the only pure church; that their principles and practices ought to be established by law; and that no others ought to be tolerated. It may be questioned, therefore, whether the administration at this time could with propriety deferve the appellation of perfecutors with regard to the Puritans. Such of the clergy, indeed, as refuled to comply with the legal ceremonies, were deprived of their livings, and sometimes in Eliza-beth's reign were otherwise punished: And ought any man to accept of an office or benefice in an establishment, while he declines compliance with the fixed and known rules of that establishment? But Puritans were never punished for frequenting separate congregations; because there were none fuch in the kingdom; and no protestant ever asfumed or pretended to the right of erecting them. The greatest well-wishers of the puritanical sect would have condemned a practice, which in that age was universally, by statesmen and ecclesiastics, philosophers and zealots, regarded as subversive of civil fociety. Even so great a reasoner as lord Bacon thought that uniformity in religion was absolutely necessary to the support of government, and that no toleration could with safety be given to sectaries". Nothing but the imputation of idolatry, which was thrown on the catholic religion, could justify, in the eyes of the Puritans themselves, the schism made by the hugonots and other protestants, Appendix.

W See his effay De unitate ecclesia.

who lived in popish countries.

In all former ages, not wholly excepting even those of Greece and Rome, religious sects and heresies and schisms had been esteemed dangerous if not pernicious to civil government, and were regarded as the source of faction, and private combination, and opposition to the laws*. The magistrate, therefore, applied himself directly to the cure of this evil as of every other; and very naturally attempted by penal statutes to suppress those separate communities, and punish the obstinate innovators. But it was found by fatal experience, and after spilling an ocean of blood in those theological quarrels, that the evil was of a peculiar nature, and was both enflamed by violent remedics, and disfused itself more rapidly throughout the whole fociety. Hence, though late, arose the paradoxical principle and salutary practice of toleration.

THE liberty of the press was incompatible with Tuch maxims and such principles of government as then prevalled, and was therefore quite unknown in that age. Besides employing the two terrible courts of star-chamber and high commission, whose powers were unlimited, queen Elizabeth exerted her authority by restraints upon the press. She passed a decree in her court of star-chamber, that is, by her own will and pleafure, forbidding any book to be printed in any place but in London, Oxford, and Cambridge ': And another, in which she prohibited, under severe penalties, the publishing of any book or pamphlet against the form or meaning of any re-Straint or ordinance, contained, or to be contained, in any statute or laws of this realm, or in any injunction made or set forth by her majesty or her privy-council, or against the true sense or meaning of any letters patent, commissions or probibitions under the great seal of

Trials. Sir Robert Knightly, vol. vii. edit. zst.

M 3

England.

Appendix. Englandy. James extended the same penalties to the importing of fuch books from abroad 4. And to render these edicts more effectual, he afterwards inhibited the printing of any book without a licence from the archbishop of Canterbury, the archbishop of York, the bishop of London, or the vice chancellor of one of the univertities, or of some person appointed by them .

In tracing the coherence among the fystems of modern theology, we may observe, that the doctrine of absolute decrees has ever been intimately connected with the enthusiastic spirit, as that doctrine affords the highest subject of joy, triumph, and fecurity to the supposed elect, and exalts them by infinite degrees above the rest of mankind. All the first reformers adopted these principles; and the Jansenists too, a fanatical sect in France, not to mention the Mahometans in Asia, have ever embraced them. As the Lutheran establishments were fubjected to episcopal jurisdiction, their enthusialtic genius gradually decayed, and men had leifure to perceive the absurdity of supposing God to punish by infinite torments what he himself from all eternity had unchangeably decreed. The king, though at this time his Calvinistic education had rivetted him in the doctrine of absolute llecrees, yet, being a zealous partisan of episcopacy, was insensibly engaged, towards the end of his reign, to favour the milder theology of Arminius. Even in so great a doctor, the genius of the religion prevailed over its speculative tenets; and with him the whole clergy gradually dropped the more rigid principles of abfolute reprobation and unconditional decrees: Some noise was at first made about these innovations; but being drowned in the fury of factions and civil wars which enfued, the scholastic arguments made an infignificant figure amidst those violent disputes about was agitated. And at the refloration, the church, though she still retained her old subscriptions and articles of faith, was found to have totally changed her speculative doctrines, and to have embraced tenets more suitable to the geness of her discipline and worship, without its being possible to assign the precise period in which the discount was produced.

[.] Z Id. ibid. y Rymer, tom. xvii. p. 522.

² Rymer, tom, xvii, p. 616.

In may be worth of arriver, that larges, from his great defire to promote controverfied divinity, erected a college at Chebes for the entertainment of twenty perfors, who should be entirely employed in refuting the papilts and published. All the efforts of the great Bacon could not procure an establishment for the cultivation of natural philosophy: Even to this day, no fociety has been instituted for the polishing and fixing of our language. The only encouragement which the fovereign in England has ever given to any thing that has the appearance of science, was this short-lived establishment of James; an institution quite superituous, considering the unhappy propension which at that time so universally possessed the nation for polemical theology.

The manners of the nation were agreeable to the Manners, monarchical government which prevailed; and contained not that strange mixture which at present distinguishes England from all other countries. Such violent extremes were then unknown of industry and debauchery, frugality and prosustion, civility and rusticity, fanaticism and scepticism. Candour, sincerity, modesty, are the only qualities which the English of that age possessed in common with the present.

High pride of family then prevailed; and it was by a dignity and stateliness of behaviour, that the gentry and nobility distinguished themselves from the common people. Great riches, acquired by commerce, were more rare, and had not as yet [·] Rennet, p. 685. Camden's Brit. vol. i. p. 370. Gibiob's e'it.

• M 4 bogn

Appendix. been able to confound all ranks of men, and render money the chief foundation of distinction. Much ceremony took place in the common intercourse of life, and little familiarity was indulged by the great. The advantages which refult from opulence are for folid and real, that those who are possessed of them need not dread the near approaches of their inferiors. The distinctions of birth and title being more empty and imaginary, foon vanish upon familial access and acquaintance.

THE expenses of the great confifted in pomp and show, and a numerous retinue, rather than in convenience and true pleafure. The carl of Nottingham, in his embaffy to Spaint, was attended by 500 persons. The earl of Hertford, in that to Brussels, carried 300 gentlemen along with him. Lord Bacon has remarked, that the English nobility in his time maintained a larger retinue of servants than the nobility of any other nation, except, perhaps, the Polanders'.

Civil honours, which now hold the first place, were at that time subordinate to the military. young gentry and nobility were fond of distinguishing themselves by arms. The fury of duels too prevailed more than at any time before or fince . This was the turn that the romantic chivalry for which the nation was formerly to renowned, had łately taken.

LIBERTY of commerce between the sexes was indulged; but without any licentiousness of manners. The court was very little an exception to this observation. James had rather entertained an aversion and contempt for the females, nor were those young courtiers, of whom he was so fond, able to break through the established manners of the nation.

THE first sedan chair seen in England was in this reign, and was used by the duke of Buckingham;

c Essays De profer. fin. imp.

⁴ Franklyn, p. 5. See also Lord Herbert's Memoirs.

to the great indignation of the people, who ex- Appendix. claimed, that he was employing his fellow creatures to do the service of beasts.

THE country life prevails at present in England beyond any cultivated nation of Europe; but it was then much more generally embraced by all the gentry. The increase of arts, pleasures, and social commerce, was just beginning to produce an inclination for the softer and the more civilized life of the city. James discouraged as much as possible this alteration of manners. "He was wont to be very " earnest," as lord Bacon tells us, "with the " country gentlemen to go from London to their " country seats. And sometimes he would say thus " to them: Gentlemen, at London, you are like ships in a sea, which show like nothing; but in your country villages you are like ships in a river, which

" look like great things"."

He was not content with reproof and exhortation. As queen Elizabeth had perceived with regret the increase of London, and had restrained all new buildings by proclamation; James, who found that these edicts were not exactly obeyed, frequently renewed them; though a strict execution scems still to have been wanting. He also issued reiterated proclamations in imitation of his predecesser; containing severe menaces against the gentry who lived in town. This policy is contrary to that which has ever been practifed by all princes who studied the increase of their authority. To allure the nobility to court; to engage them in expensive pleasures or employments which diffipate their fortune; to increase their subjection to ministers by attendance; to weaken their authority in the provinces by absence: These have been the common arts of arbitrary government. But James, besides that he had certainly laid no plan for extending his power, had no money

Appendix. to support a splendid court, or bestow on a numerous retinue of gentry and nobility. He thought too that by their living together, they became more fenfible of their own strength, and were apt to indulge too curious researches into matters of government. To remedy the present evil, he was desirous of difperfing them into their country-feats; where, he hoped, they would bear a more submissive reverence. to his authority, and receive less support from each other. But the contrary effect foon followed. The riches amaffed during their refidence at leane tendered them independent. The refluence equired by hospitality made them is able they would not be led by the court: "I! could not be driven: And thus the fysicm of the Uiglish government received a total and a ludden literation in the coarle of lefs than forty years.

Till first life of commerciand the arts had contributed, in preceding reign , to feather those immense fortunes of the barons which rendered they fo formidable both to king and people. The farther progress of these advantages began during this reign to ruin the fmall proprietors of land "; and, by both events, the gentry, or that rank which composed the house of commons, 'enlarged their power and authority. The early improvements in luxury were seized by the greater nobles, whose fortunes, placing them above frugality, or even calculation, were foon dissipated in expensive pleasures. These improvements reached at last all men of property; and those of slender fortunes, who at that time were often men of family, imitating those of a rank immediately above them, reduced themselves to poverty. Their lands, coming to fale, swelled the estates of those who possessed riches sufficient for the fashionable expences; but who were not exempted from some care and attention to their domestic ecconomy.

8 Cabbala, p. 224. first edit,

THE gentry also of that age were engaged in no Appendix. expence, except that of country hospitality. No taxes were levied, no wars waged, no attendance at court expected, no bribery or profusion required at elections. Could human nature ever reach hapnicels, the condition of the English gentry under fo mild and benign a prince, might merit that appellation.

THE amount of the king's revenue, as it stood in Finances. 1617, is thus stated': Of crown lands, 80,000 pounds a-year; by customs and new impositions, near 190,000; by wards and other various branches of revenue, beside purveyance, 180,000. The whole amounting to 450,000. The king's ordinary dithursements, by the same account, are said to excond this furn thirty-fix thousand pounds's. All the expaoreman films which James had raifed by fubsidies, loans, lide of lands, sale of the title of baronet, money paid by the flates, and by the king of France. Line clences, &c. were in the whole about two millious two hundred thousand pounds: Of which he fale of lands afforded seven hundred and feventy-five thouland pounds. The extraordinary difburiements of the king amounted to two millions; befide above four hundred thousand pounds given in presents. Upon the whole, a sufficient reason appears, parely from necessary expences, partly for want of a rield economy, why the king, even early in his reign, was deeply involved in debt, and found great difficulty to support the government.

FIRMERS,

h Men feem then to have been ambitious of representing the counties, but careless of the bordughs. A teat in the house was in itself of small importance: But the former became a point of honour among the gentlemen. Journ. is b. 1620. Towns, which had formally neglected their right of fending members, now began to claim it. Jeurn. 26 Feb. 1623

An abilitact or brief dectaration of his majefty's revenue, with the affiguations and defalcations upon the fame. k The excess was formerly greater, as appears by Salisbury's Account. See chap. 2.

Appendix. FARMERS, not commissioners, levied the customs. It seems, indeed, requisite, that the former method should always be tried before the latter, though a preferable one. When men's own interest is concerned, they fall upon a hundred expedients to prevent frauds in the merchants; and these the public may afterwards imitate in establishing proper rules for its officers.

> THE customs were supposed to amount to five per cent. of the value, and were levied upon exports as well as imports. Nay, the imposition upon exports, by James's additions, is faid to amount in some few instances to twenty-five per cent. This practice, so hurtful to industry, prevails still in France, Spain, and most countries of Europe. The customs in 1604 yielded 127,000 pounds a-year 1: They rose to 190,000 towards the end of the reign.

> INTEREST, during this reign, was at ten per cent. till 1624, when it was reduced to eight. This high interest is an indication of the great profits and small progress of commerce.

THE extraordinary supplies granted by parliament during this whole reign amounted not to more than 630,000 pounds; which, divided among twenty-one years, makes 30,000 pounds a-year. I do not include those supplies, amounting to 300,000 pounds, which were given to the king by his last patliament. These were paid in to their own commissioners; and the expences of the Spanish war were much more than sufficient to exhaust them. The distressed family of the palatine was a great burthen on James, during part of his reign, king, it is pretended, possessed not frugality proportioned to the extreme narrowness of his revenue. Splendid equipages, however, he did not affect, nor costly furniture, nor a luxurious table, nor prodigal mistresses. His buildings too were not sumptuous; though the Banqueting-house must not be forgot-Appendixten, as a monument which does honour to his reign. Hunting was his chief amusement, the cheapest pleasure in which a king can indulge himself. His expences were the effects of liberality, rather than of luxury.

¹ Journ. 21 May 1604.

ONE day, it is faid, while he was standing amidst some of his courtiers, a porter passed by loaded with money, which he was carrying to the treasury. The king observed that Rich, afterwards earl of Holland, one of his handsome agreeable favourites, whispered something to one standing near him. Upon inquiry, he found that Rich had faid, how happy would that money make mc! Without hefitation James bestowed it all upon him, though it amounted to 3000 pounds. He added, You think yourself very happy in obtaining so large a sum; but I am more happy in having an opportunity of obliging a worthy man, whom I love. The generofity of James was more the result of a benign humour or light fancy, than of reason or judgment. The objects of it were fuch as could render themselves agreeable to him in his loofe hours; not fuch as were endowed with great merit, or who possessed talents or popularity which could strengthen his interest with the public.

The same advantage, we may remark, over the people, which the crown formerly reaped from that interval between the fall of the peers and the rise of the commons, was now possessed by the people against the crown, during the continuance of a like interval. The sovereign had already lost that independent revenue by which he could subsist without regular supplies from parliament; and he had not yet acquired the means of influencing those assemblies. The effects of this situation, which commenced with the accession of the house of Stuart, soon rose to a great height, and were more or less propagated

Appendix. propagated throughout all the reigns of that unhappy family.

Subsidies and lifteenths are frequently mentioned by historians; but neither the amount of there taxes nor the method of levying them have been well explained. It appears, that the fifteenths formerly corresponded to the name, and were that preportionable part of the moveables. I'm a voluntion having been made in the reign of Fdww! Ill., that valuation was always adhered to, and each town paid unalterably a particular fum, which the inhabitants themselves assessed upon their fellow-citizens. I he fame tax in corporate towns was called a tenth; because, there at first it was a tenth of the moveable. The whole amount of a tenth and a fifteenth throughout the kingdom, or a fifteenth as it is often more concifely called, was about 29,000 pounds". The amount of a subsidy was not invariable, like that of a fifteenth. In the eighth of Elizabeth a fubfidy amounted to 120,000 pounds: In the fegtieth it was not above 78,000°. It afterwards fell to 70,000; and was continually dereasing. The reason is easily collected from the method of levying it. We may learn from the subfidy bills 4, that one labfidy was given for four shillings in the pound on land, and two skillings and eight-pence on moveables throughout the counties; a confiderable tax, had it been strictly levied. But this was only the ancient state of a subsidy. During the reign of James, there was not paid the twentieth part of that fum. The tax was to far personal that a man paid only in the county where he lived, though he should possess estates in other counties; and the affessors formed a loose cstimation of his property, and rated him accordingly. To preferve, however,

m Coke's Inft. book iv. chap. i. of fiftcenths, quirzins.

n Id. fideficher temper age. 🤚 Josaa. 💶 July មេមែ•

P Cche's Infl. book iv. chap. i. fablid as temporary.

one rule in the estimation, it seems to have been the practice to keep an eye to former assessments, and to rate every man according as his ancestors, or men of such an estimated property, were accustomed to pay. This was a sufficient reason why subsidies could not increase, notwithstanding the great increase of money and rise of rents. But there was an evident reason why they continually decreased. The favour, as is natural to suppose, rain always against the crown; especially ring the latter end of Picabeth, when subsidies me can under the levied were sompared to former happlies. The affectors, though accallonned to have an eve to ancient ellimations, were not bound to observe any fuch rule; but might rate anew any perion according to his prefent income. When rems fell, or part of an estate was fold off, the proprietor was fure to reprefere thefe toffes, and obtain a diminution of his fubfidy; but where tents role, or new lands were purchased, he Rept his own fecret, and paid no more than formerly. The advantage, therefore, of every change was taken against the crown; and the crown could obtain the advantage of none. And to make the matter worse, the alterations which happened in property during this age were generally unfavourable to the crown. The small proprietors, or twenty pound men, went continually to decay; and when their estates were swallowed up by a greater, the new purchaser increased not his subsidy. So loose indeed is the whole method of rating subfidies, that the wonder was not how the tax should continually diminish; but how it yielded any revenue at all. It became at last so unequal and uncertain, that the parliament was obliged to change it into a land tax.

The price of corn during this reign, and that of the other necessaries of life, was no lower, or was rather higher than at present. By a proclamation of James, establishing public magazines, whenever wheat

Appendix wheat fell below thirty-two shillings a quarter, rye below eighteen, barley below fixteen, the commifsioners were empowered to purchase corn for the magazines. These prices then are to be regarded as low; though they would rather pass for high by our present estimation. The usual bread of the poor was at this time made of barley's. The best wool, during the greater part of James's reign, was at thirty-three shillings a tod '. At present it is not above two-thirds of that value; though it is to be prefumed that our exports in woollen goods are fomewhat increased. The finer manufactures too, by the progress of arts and industry, have rather diminished in price, notwithstanding the great increase of money. In Shakespeare, the hostess tells Falstaff, that the shirts she bought him were holland at eight shillings a yard; a high price at this day, even supposing, what is not probable, that the best holland at that time was equal in goodness to the best that can now be purchased. In like manner, a yard of velvet, about the middle of Ekzabeth's reign, was valued at two and twenty shillings. appears from Dr. Birch's life of prince Henry", that that prince, by contract with his butcher, payed near a groat a-pound throughout the year for all the beef and mution used in his family. Besides, we must consider, that the general turn of that age, which no laws could prevent, was the converting of arable land into pasture: A certain proof that the latter was found more profitable, and consequently that all butcher's meat, as well as bread, was rather higher than at present. We have a regulation of the market with regard to poultry and some other articles. very early in Charles I.'s reign "; and the prices are high. A turkey-cock four shillings and sixpence, Rymer, tom. xvii. p. 526. To the same purpose, see also 21 Rymer, tom. xx. p. 15. Jac. II. cap. 28. see a compendium or dialogue inferted in the Memoirs of Wool, W Rymer, tom. xix. p. 511. 4 P. 449. chap. 23.

a turkey-hen three shillings, a pheasant cock fix, a Appendix. pheasant hen five, a partridge one shilling, a goose two, a capon two and fixpence, a pullet one and fixpence, a rabbit eight pence, a dozen of pigeons fix shillings x. We must consider, that London at present is more than three times more populous than it was at that time: A circumstance which much increases the price of poultry, and of every thing that cannot conveniently be brought from a distance: Not to mention that these regulations by authority are always calculated to diminish, never to increase the market prices. The contractors for victualling the navy were allowed by government' eight pence a day for the diet of each man when in harbour, feven pence halfpenny when at fea '; which would suffice at present. The chief difference in expence between that age and the present consists in the imaginary wants of men, which have fince extremely multiplied. These are the principal reafons why James's revenue would go farther than the same money in our time; though the disserence is not near to great as is usually imagined.

THE public was entirely free from the danger Arms. and expence of a standing army. While James was vaunting his divine vicegerency, and boasting of his high prerogative, he possessed not so much as a single regiment of guards to maintain his extensive claims: A sufficient proof that he sincerely believed his pretentions to be well grounded, and a strong presumption that they were at least built on what were then deemed plausible arguments. The militia

Vol. VI.

^{*} We may judge of the great grievance of purveyance by this circumstance, that the purveyors often gave but sixpence for a dozen of pigeons, and two pence for a fowl. Journ. 25 May 1626.

Rymer, tom. xvii. p. 441, et seq. 2 This volume was written above twenty-eight years before the present edition of 1786. In that short period, prices have perhaps risen more than during the preceding hundred and fifty.

Appendix. of England, amounting to 160,000 men , was the sole desence of the kingdom. It is pretended that they were kept in good order during this reign b. The city of London procured officers who had ferved abroad, and who taught the trained bands their exercise in Artillery-garden; a practice which had been difcontinued fince 1588. All the counties of England, in emulation of the capital, were fond of shewing a well-ordered and well-appointed It appeared that the natural propenfity of men towards military shows and exercises will go far, with a little attention in the fovereign, towards exciting and supporting this spirit in any nation. The very boys at this time, in mimicry of their elders, inlifted themselves voluntarily into companies, elected officers, and practifed the discipline, of which the models were every day exposed to their view . Sir Edward Harwood, in a memorial composed at the beginning of the subsequent reign, fays, that England was fo unprovided with horses fit for war, that 2000 men could not possibly be mounted throughout the whole kingdom . At present the breed of horses is so much improved, that almost all those which are employed either in the plough, waggon, or coach, would be fit for that purpole.

> THE disorders of Ireland obliged James to keep up some forces there, and put him to great expence. The common pay of a private man in the infantry was eight pence a-day, a lieutenant two shillings, an entign eighteen pence 5.5. The armies in Europe were not near fo numerous during that age; and the private men, we may observe, were

b Stowe. See also 2 Journ. 1 March 1623. fir Walter Ruleigh of the Prerogatives of Parliament, and Johnstoni c Stowe. Hift, lib, xviii.

d In the Harleyan Miscellany, vol. iv. p 255.

Rymer, tom. xvi. 1. 717. .

drawn from a better rank than at present, and ap- Appendix.

proaching mearer to that of the officers.

In the year 1583 there was a general review made of all the men in England capable of bearing arms; and these were found to amount to 1,172,000 men, according to Raleigh 1. It is impossible to warrant the exactness of this computation; or, rather, we may fairly presume it to be somewhat inaccurate. But if it approached near the truth, Lugland has probably, fince that time, increased in populousness. The growth of London, in riches and beauty, as well as in numbers of inhabitants, has been prodigious. From 1600 it doubled every forty years*; and confequently, in 1680, it contained four times as many inhabitants as at the beginning of the century. It has ever been the centre o all the trade in the kingdom; and almost the only town that affords fociety and amufement. The affection which the English bear to a country life makes the provincial towns be little frequented by the gentry. Nothing but the allurements of the capital, which is favoured by the refidence of the king, and by being the feat of government, and of all the courts of justice, can prevail over their pasfion for their rural villas.

London at this time was almost entirely built of wood, and in every respect was certainly a very ugly city. The earl of Arundel first introduced the general practice of brick buildings b.

THE navy of England was, esteemed formidable Navy. in Elizabeth's time, yet it confisted only of thirtythree ships, besides pinnaces': And the largest of Sir William Petty. h Sir Edward Walker's Political Discourtes, p. 270. i Coke's Ink. book iv. chap. 1.

Consultation in parliament for the navy.

Of the invention of thisping. This number is much superior to that contained in Murder, and that delivered by fir Edward Coke to the house of commons; and is more likely.

Appendix these would not equal our fourth-rates at present. Raleigh advises never to build a ship of war above 600 tons k. James was not negligent of the navy. In five years preceding 1623, he built ten new ships, and expended fifty thousand pounds a-year on the fleet, beside the value of thirty-six thousand pounds in timber, which he annually gave from the royal forests 1. The largest ship that had ever come from the English docks was built during this reign. She was only 1400 tons, and carried fixty-four guns m. The merchant ships, in cases of necessity, were instantly converted into ships of war. The king affirmed to the parliament, that the navy had never before been in so good a condition ".

Commerce.

EVERY session of parliament during this reign, we meet with grievous lamentations concerning the decay of trade, and the growth of popery: Such violent propensity have men to complain of the present times, and to entertain discontent against their fortune and condition. The king himself was deceived by these popular complaints, and was at a loss to account for the total want of money, which he heard so much exaggerated . It may, however, be affirmed, that during no preceding period of English history, was there a more sensible increase than during the reign of this monarch, of all the advantages which distinguish a slourishing people. Not only the peace which he maintained was favourable to industry and commerce: His turn of mind inclined him to promote the peaceful arts: And trade being yet in its infancy, all additions

E Parl. Hift. vol. vi. p. 94.

* Rymer, tom. xvii. p. 413°

By Rangh's account, in his Licourse of the first invention of shipping, the fleet, in the twenty-fourth of the queen, consisted only of thirteen ships, and was augmented afterwards eleven. He probably reckoned some to be puinaces, which Coke called ships.

Journ. 27 March 1623. Sir William Monson makes the numher amount only to nine new ships, p. 253.

to it must have been the more evident to every eye, Appendix. which was not blinded by melancholy prejudices.

By an account which feems judicious and accurate, it appears that all the scamen employed in the merchant service amounted to 10,000 men, which probably exceeds not the fifth part of their present number. Sir Thomas Overbury says, that the Dutch possessed three times more shipping than the English, but that their ships were of inferior burden to those of the latter'. Sir William Monion computed the English naval power to be little or nothing inferior to the Dutch', which is furely an exaggeration. The Dutch at this time traded to England with 600 ships; England to Holland with fixty only.

A CATALOGUE of the manufactures, for which Manufacthe English were them eminent, would appear very tures. contemptible, in comparison of those which sourish among them at present. Almost all the more elaborate and curious arts were only cultivated abroad, particularly in Italy, Holland, and the Netherlands. Ship-building, and the founding of iron cannon, were the fole in which the English excelled. They leem, indeed, to have possessed alone the secret of the latter, and great complaints were made every parliament against the exportation of English ordnance.

NINE tenths of the commerce of the kingdom consisted in woollen goods". Wool, however, was allowed to be exported, till the nineteenth of the king. Its exportation was then forbidden by proclamation, though that edict was never strictly executed. Most of the cloth was exported raw, and was dyed and dressed by the Dutch; who gained, it is pretended,

Journ. 26th May 1621..

P See note [S] at the end of the volume. The trade's increase, in the Harleyan Misc. vol. iii. Remarks on his Travels, Harl. Mife. voleti. p. 349.

Naval Tracts, p. 329. 350. Raleigh's Observations.

Appendix, 7003000 pounds a-year by this manufacture. A proclamation issued by the king against exporting cloth in that condition, had fucceeded fo ill during one year, by the refufal of the Dutch to buy the dreffed cloth, that great murmurs arose against it; measure was retracted by the king, and and the ce uplanted of by the nation, as if it had been the most impossible in the world. It seems indeed to have been premature.

> In so little credit was the fine English cloth even at home, that the king was obliged to feck expedients by which he might engage the people of fashion to wear it ... The manufacture of fine linen was totally unknown in the kingdom y.

THE company of merchant-adventurers, by their patent, possibled the sole commerce of woollen goods, though the staple commodity of the kingdom. An attempt made during the reign of Elizabeth to lay open this important trade had been attended with bad confequences for a time, by a conspiracy of the merchant-adventurers, not to make any purchases of cloth; and the queen immediately restored them their patent.

• It was the groundless fear of a like accident that enflaved the nation to those exclusive companies, which confined fo much every branch of commerce and industry. The parliament, however, annulled, in the third of the king, the patent of the Spanish company; and the trade to Spain, which was at first very infiguificant, soon became the most considerable in the kingdom. It is strange that they were not thence encouraged to abolish all the other companies, and that they went no farther than oblig-

* Rymer, tom, xvii. p. 415. y Id. ibid.

w Journ. 20 May 1614. Raleigh, in his Observations, computes the loss at 400,000 pounds to the nation. There are about 80,000 undressed cloths, says he, exported yearly. He computes, besides, that about 100,000 pounds a year had been lost by kersies; not to mention other articles. The account of 200,000 cloths a year exported in Elizabeth's reign, seems to be exaggerated.

ing them to enlarge their bottom, and to facilitate Appendix. the admission of new adventurers.

A BOARD of trade was creeted by the king in 16227. One of the reasons assigned in the commission, is to remedy the low price of wool, which begat complaints of the decay of the woollen manufactory. It is more probable, however, that this fall of prices proceeded from the increase of wool. The king likewife recommends it to the commissioners to inquire and examine, whether a greater freedom of trade, and an exemption from the restraint of exclusive companies, would not be beneficial. Men were then fettered by their own prejudices; and the king was justly afraid of embracing a bold measure, whose consequences might be uncertain. The digesting of a navigation act, of a like nature with the famous one executed afterwards by the republican parliament, is likewise recommended to the commissioners. The arbitrary powers then commonly assumed by the privy-council, appear evidently through the whole tenor of the commission.

THE filk manufacture had no footing in England: But, by James's direction, mulberry-trees were planted, and filk-worms introduced. The climate feems unfavourable to the success of this project. The planting of hops increased much in England during this reign.

GREENLAND is thought to have been discovered about this period; and the whale sishery was carried on with success: But the industry of the Dutch, in spite of all opposition, soon deprived the English of this source of riches. A company was erected for the discovery of the north-west passage; and many fruitless attempts were made for that purpose. In such noble projects, despair ought never to be Rymer, tom. xvii. p. 410. A Stowe. admitted,

Appendix- admitted, till the absolute impossibility of success be fully ascertained.

THE passage to the East-Indies had been opened. to the English during the reign of Elizabeth; but the trade to those parts was not entirely established till this reign, when the East-India company received a new patent, enlarged their stock to 1,500,000 pounds by and fitted out several ships on these adventures. In 1609 they built a vessel of 1200 ton, the largest merchant ship that England had ever known. She was unfortunate, and perished by shipwreck. In 1611, a large ship of the company, assisted by a pinnace, maintained sive several engagements with a squadron of Portuguese, and gained a complete victory over forces much superior. During the following years the Dutch company was guilty of great injuries towards the English, in expelling many of their factors, and destroying their settlements: But these violences were resented with a proper spirit by the court of England. A naval force was equipped under the earl of Oxford', and lay in wait for the return of the Dutch East-India fleet. By reason of cross-winds, Oxford failed of his purpose, and the Dutch escaped. Some time after, one rich ship was taken by vice-admiral Merwin; and it was stipulated by the Dutch to pay 70,000 pounds to the English company, in confideration of the losses which that company had fustained. But neither this stipulation, nor the fear of reprisals, nor the sense of that friendship which ful sisted between England and the States, could restrain the avidity of the Dutch company, or render them equitable in their proceedings towards their allies. Impatient to have the sole possession of the spice trade, which the English then shared with them, they assumed a jurisdicton over a facb Journ. 26th Nov. 1621.

c In 1622.

tary of the latter in the island of Amboyna; and on Appendix. very improbable, and even abfurd pretences, feized all the factors, with their families, and put them to death with the most inhuman tortures. This dismal news arrived in England at the time when Tames, by the prejudices of his subjects, and the. intrigues of his favourite, was constrained to make a breach with Spain; and he was obliged, after some remonstrances, to acquiesce in this indignity from a state whose alliance was now become necessary to him. It is remarkable that the nation, almost without a murmur, submitted to this injury from their protestant confederates; an injury which, besides the horrid enormity of the action, was of much deeper importance to national interest, than all those which they were so impatient to resent from the house of Austria.

THE exports of England from Christmas 1612 to Christmas 1613 are computed at 2,487,435 pounds: The imports at 2,141,151: So that the balance is favour of England was 346,284°. But in 1622 the exports were 2,320,436 pounds; the imports 2,619,315; which makes a balance of 298,879 pounds against England . The coinage in England from 1599 to 1619 amounted to 4,779,314 pounds 13 stallings and 4 pences: A proof that. the balance in the main was considerably in favour of the kingdom. As the annual imports and exports together role to near five millions, and the customs never yielded so much as 200,000 pounds a-year, of which tonnage made a part, it appears that the new rates affixed by James did not, on the whole, amount to one shilling in the pound, and consequently were still inferior to the intention of the original grant of parliament. The East-India company usually carried out a third of their cargo in commodities h. The trade to Turkey was one of the most gainful to the nation h. It appears that copper halfpence and farthings began to be coined in this reign. Tradefinen had commonly carried on their retail business chiefly by means of leaden tokens. The small silver penay was soon lost, and at this time was a where to be found.

e Misselden's Circle of Commerce, p. 221. Id. ibid.

Happy future State of England, p. 78. Munn's Discourse on the East-Inda Trade.

 \mathbf{Appe}

Colonies.

- What chilly renders the reign of James memorable, s the commencement of the English colonies in America; colonies established on the noblest sooting that has been known in any age or nation. The Spamards, being the first discoverers of the new world immediately took possession of the precious mines which they found there; and by the allurement of great riches, they were empted to depopulate their own country, as well as that which they conquered; and added the vice of floth to those of avidity and barbarity, which had attended their adventurers in those renowned enterprises. That fine coast was entirely neglected, which reaches from St. Augustin to Cape Breton, and which lies in all the temperate climates, is watered by noble" rivers, and offers a fertile foil, but nothing more to the industrious planter. Peopled gradually from England by the necessitous and indigent, who at home increased neither wealth nor populousness, the colonies which were planted along that tract have promoted the navigation, encouraged the industry, and even perhaps multiplied the inhabitants of their mother-country. The spirit of independency, which was reviving in England, here shone forth in its full lustre, and received new accession from the aspiring character of those who, being discontented with the established church and monarchy, had sought for freedom amidit those savage deserts.

QUEEN Elizabeth had done little more than given a name to the continent of Virginia; and after her planting one feeble colony, which quickly decayed, i Anderson, vol. i. 17 447.

h Munn's Discourse on the East-India Trade, p. 17.

that country was entirely abandoned. But when Appendix. peace put an end to the military enterprises against Spain, and lest ambitious spirits no hopes of making any longer fuch rapid advances towards honour and fortune, the nation began to second the pacific intentions of its monarch, and to feek a furer, though flower expedient, for acquiring riches and glory. In 1606, Newport carried over a colony, and began a fettlement, which the company erected by patent for that purpose in Loudon and Bristol, took care to supply with yearly recruits of provisions, utenfils, and new inhabitants. About 1609, Argal discovered a more direct and shorter passage to Virginia, and left the tract of the ancient navigators, who had first directed their course southwards to the tropic, failed wellward by means of the trade-winds, and then turned northward, till they reached the English settlements. The fame year, five hundred perfons under fir Thomas Gates and fir George Somers were embarked for Virginia. Somers's ship, meeting with a tempest, was driven into the Bermudas, and laid the foundation of a fettlement in those illands. Lord Delawar afterwards undertook the government of the English colonies: But notwishstanding all his care, Teconded by supplies from James, and by money raised from the first lottery ever known in the kingdom, such dissigulties attended the settlement of these countries, that in 1614 there were not alive more than 400 men, of all that had been fent thither. After supplying themselves with provisions more immediately necesfary for the support of life, the new planters began the cultivating of tobacco; and James, notwithstanding his antipathy to that drug, which he affirmed to be pernicious to men's morals as well as their health', gave them permission to enter it in England; and k Rymer, tom. xvii. p. 621.

Appendix. he inhibited by proclamation all importation of it from Spain. By degrees, new colonies were established in that continent, and gave new names to the places where they settled, leaving that of Virginia to the province first planted. The island of Barbadoes was also planted in this reign.

Speculative reasoners, during that age, raised many objections to the planting of those remote colonies; and foretold that, after draining their mother-country of inhabitants, they would foon shake off her yoke, and erect an independent government in America: But time has fliewn, that the views entertained by those who encouraged such generous undertakings, were more just and solid. A mild government and great naval force have preserved, and may still preferve during some time, the dominion of England over her colonies. And such advantages have commerce and navigation reaped from these-establishments, that more than a fourth of the English shipping is at present computed to be employed in carrying on the traffic with the American settlements.

Agriculture was anciently very imperfect in England. The sudden transitions so often mentioned by historians, from the lowest to the highest price of grain, and the prodigious inequality of its value in different years, are sufficient proofs that the produce depended entirely on the seasons, and that art had as yet done nothing to sence against the injuries of the heavens. During this reign considerable improvements were made, as in most arts, so in this the most beresicial of any. A numerous catalogue might be formed of books and pamphlets treating of husbandry, which were written about this time. The nation, however, was still dependent on foreigners for daily bread; and though its exportation of grain now forms a considerable branch of its Appendix. commerce, notwithstanding its probable increase of people, there was in that period a regular importation from the Baltic, as well as from France; and if it ever stopped, the bad consequences were senfibly felt by the nation. Sir Walter Raleigh in his observations computes, that two millions went out at one time for corn. It was not till the fifth of Elizabeth, that the exportation of corn had been allowed in England; and Camden observes, that agriculture from that moment received new life and vigour.

¹ Rymer, tom. xviii. p. 621. 633.

THE endeavours of James, or, more properly speaking, those of the nation, for promoting trade, were attended with greater fuccels, than those for the encouragement of learning. Though the age was by no means destitute of eminent writers, a very bad taste in general prevailed during that period; and the monarch himself was not a little infected with it.

On the origin of letters among the Greeks, the Learning genius of poets and orators, as might naturally be and arts. expected, was distinguished by an amiable simplicity, which, whatever rudeness may sometimes attende it, is so fitted to express the genuine movements of nature and passion, that the compositions possessed of. it must ever appear valuable to the discorning part of mankind. The glaring figures of discourse, the pointed antithesis, the unnatural conceit, the jingle of words; fuch false ornaments were not employed by early writers; not because they were rejected, but because they scarcely ever occurred to them. easy unforced strain of sentiment runs through their compositions; though at the same time we may obferve, that amidst the most elegant simplicity of thought and expression, one is sometimes surprised to meet with a poor conceit, which had presented itself unsought for, and which the author had not acquired

Appendix acquired critical observation enough to condemn ". A bad taste seizes with avidity these frivolous beauties, and even perhaps a good tafte, ere furfeited by them: They multiply every day more and more in the fashionable compositions: Nature and good sense are neglected: Laboured ornaments studied and admired: And a total degeneracy of style and language prepares the way for barbarism and ignorance. Hence the Asiatic manner was found to depart so much from the simple purity of Athens: Hence that tinsel eloquence which is observable in many of the Roman writers, from which Cicero himself is not whelly exempted, and which so much prevails in Ovid, Seneca, Lucan, Martial, and the Plinys.

On the revival of letters, when the judgment of the public is yet raw and unformed, this falle glitter catches the eye, and leaves no room, either in eloquence or poetry, for the durable beauties of folid fense and lively passion. The reigning genius is then diametrically opposite to that which prevails on the first origin of arts. The Imlian writers, it is evident, even the most celebrated, have not reached the proper simplicity of thought and composition; and in Petrarch, Tasso, Guarini, frivolous · witticisms and sorced conceits are but too predominant. The period during which letters were cultivated in Italy, was fo fhort as fcarcely to allow leifure for correcting this adulterated relish.

'THE more early French writers are liable to the Voiture, Balzac, even Corneille, fame reproach.

In The name of Polynices, one of Oedipus's fons, means in the original much quarreding. In the altercations between the two brothers, in Alchylus, coplincies, and Euripides, this conceit is employed; and it is remarkable, that to poor a conundrum could not be rejected · by any of these three poets, so justly celebrated for their taste and simplicity. What could bhakespeare have done worse? Terence has his inceptiq est amentium, non amantium. Many similar instances will occur to the learned. It is well known, that Armothe treats very leriously of puns, divides them into several classes, and recommends the use of them to orators. - have have too much affected those ambitious ornaments, Appendix. Which the Italians in general, and the least pure of the ancients, supplied them with so many models. Indict was not till late, that observation and reslection gave rise to a more matural turn of thought and composition among that elegant people.

A ruch character may be extended to the first Lighth writers; fuch as flourished during the reigns of Lliza. th and James, and even till long alterwards. Learning, on its revival in this island, was attired in the lawe unnatural garb which it wore at the time of its decay among the Greeks and Romane. And, what may be regarded as a nichentune, the English writers were possessed of great genius before they were endowed with any derroe of tafte, and by that means gave a kind of landion to those foreed turns and sentiments which they so much affected. Their distorted conceptions and expressions are attended with such vigour of mind, that we admire the imagination which prodeced them, as much as we blame the want of judgment which save them advistance. To enter into an exact criticism of the writers of that age would exceed our present purpose. A short character of the most eminent, delivered with the same freedom which, hillwry exercites over kings and ministers, may not be improper. The national prepossessions, which prevail, will perhaps render the former liberty not the least perilous for an author.

If Shakespeare be considered as a MAN, born in a rude age, and educated in the lowest manner, without any instruction, either from the world or from books, he may be regarded as a prodigy: If represented as a Poet, capable of furbishing a proper entertainment to a refined or intelligent audience, we must abate much of this eulogy. In his compositions, we regret, that many irregularities, and even absurdities, should so frequently disfigure

Appendix the animated and passionate scenes intermixed with them; and at the same time, we perhaps admire the more those beauties, on account of their being surrounded with such deformities. A striking peculiarity of sentiment, adapted to a single character, he frequently hits, as it were, by inspiration; but a reasonable propriety of thought he cannot for any time uphold. Nervous and picturesque expressions as well as descriptions abound in him; but it is in vain we look either for purity or simplicity of dietion. His total ignorance of all theatrical art and conduct, however material a defect; yet, as it affects the spectator, rather than the reader, we can more easily excuse, than that want of taste which often prevails in his productions, and which gives way only by intervals to the irradiations of genius. A great and fertile genius he certainly possessed, and one enriched equally with a tragic and comic vein; but he ought to be cited as a proof, how dangerous it is to rely on these advantages alone for attaining an excellence in the finer arts". And there may even remain a suspicion that we over-rate, if postible, the greatness of his genius; in the same manner as bodies often appear more gigantic, on account of their being disproportioned and misshapen. He died in 1616, aged 53 years.

Johnson possessed all the learning which was wanting to Shakespeare, and wanted all the genius of which the other was possessed. Both of them were equally deficient in taste and elegance, in harmony and correctness. A service copyist of the ancients, Johnson translated into bad English the beautiful passages of the Greek and Roman authors, without accommodating them to the manners of his age and country. His merit has been totally eclipsed by that of Shakespeare, whose rude genius prevailed over the n Invenire etiam barbari Jolent, disponere et ornare non nist cruditus. PLIN-

rude art of his cotemporary. The English theatre Appendix. has ever since taken a strong tincture of Shakespeare's spirit and character; and thence it has proceeded, that the nation has undergone from all its neighbours, the reproach of barbarism, from which its valuable productions in some other parts of learning would otherwise have exempted it. Johnson had a pension of a hundred marks from the king, which Charles afterwards augmented to a hundred pounds. He died in 1637, aged 63.

FAIRFAX has translated Tasso with an elegance and ease, and at the same time with an exactness, which for that age are surprising. Each line in the original is faithfully rendered by a correspondent line in the translation. Harringson's translation of Ariosto is not likewise without its enerit. It is to be regretted that these poets should have imitated the Italians in their stanza, which has a prolixity and uniformity in it that displeases in long performances. They had otherwise, as well as Spenser, who went before them, contributed much to the polishing and resining of English versification.

In Donne's satires, when carefully inspected, there appear some slashes of wit and ingenuity; but these totally suffocated and buried by the hardest and most uncouth expression that is any-where to be met with.

If the poetry of the English was so rude and impersect during that age, we may reasonably expect that their prose would be liable still to greater objections. Though the latter appears the more easy, as it is the more natural method of composition; it has ever in practice been found the more rare and dissicult; and there scarcely is an instance in any language, that it has reached a degree of persection before the resinement of poetical numbers and expression. English prose, during the reign of James, was written with little regard to the rules of grammar, and with a total disregard to the elegance and Vol. VI.

Appendix harmony of the period. Stuffed with Latin sen-tences and quotations, it likewise imitated those invertions which, however forcible and graceful in the ancient languages, are intirely contrary to the idiom of the English. I shall indeed venture to affirm, that whatever uncouth phrases and expresfions occur in old books, they were chiefly owing to the unformed taste of the author; and that the language spoken in the courts of Elizabeth and James was very little different from that which we meet with at present in good company. Of this opinion the little scraps of speeches which are found in the parliamentary journals, and which carry an air fo opposite to the laboured orations, seem to be a fufficient proof; and there want not productions of that age which, being written by men who were not authors by profession, retain a very natural manner, and may give us some idea of the language which prevailed among men of the world. I fhall particularly mention fir John Davis's Discovery, Throgmorton's, Essex's, and Nevil's letters. In a more early period, Cavendish's life of cardinal Wolfey, the pieces that remain of bishop Gardiner, and Anne Boleyn's letter to the king, differ little or nothing from the language of our time.

THE great glory of literature in this island during the reign of James, was lord Bacon. Most of his performances were composed in Latin; though he possessed neither the clegance of that, nor of his native torgue. If we confider the variety of talents displayed by this man; as a public speaker, a man of buildels, a wit, a courtier, a companion, an author, a philipsopher; he is justly the object of great admiration. It is we consider Jim merely as an author and philosopher, the light in which we view him at present, though very estimable, he was yet inferior to his cotemporary Galilaeo, perhaps even to Kepler. Bacon pointed out at a distance the road to true philosophy; Calilaco both pointed it out-to others, others, and made himself considerable advances in it. Appendix. The Englishman was ignorant of geometry to The Florentine revived that science, excelled in it, and was the first that applied it, together with experiment, to natural philosophy. The former rejected, with the most positive disdain, the system of Copernicus: The latter fortified it with new proofs, derived both from reason and the senses. Bacon's style is stiff and rigid: His wit, though pften brilliant, is also often unnatural and far-fetched; and he feems to be the original of those pointed fimilies and long-foun allegories which so much distinguish the English authors: Galilmo is a lively and agreeable, though somewhat a profix writer. But Italy, not united in any fingle government, and perhaps fatiated with that literary glory which it has possessed both in ancient and modern times, has too much neglected the renown which it has acquired by giving birth to so great a man. That national spirit which prevails among the English, and which forms their great happiness, is the cause why they bestow on all their eminent writers, and on Bacon among the rest, such praises and acclamations as may often appear partial and excessive. He died in 1626, in the 66th year of his age.

Ir the reader of Raleigh's history can have the patience to wade through the Jewish and Rubbinical learning which compose the half of the volume; he will find, when he comes to the Greek and Roman story, that his pains are not unrewarded. Raleigh is the best model of that ancient style which some writers would affect to revive at present. He was beheaded in 1618, aged 66 years.

CAMDEN's history of queen Elizaleth may be esteemed good composition, both for style and matter. It is written with simplicity of expression, very rare in that age, and with a regard to truth. It would not perhaps be too much to affirm, that it

Appendix. is among the best historical productions which have yet been composed by any Englishman. It is well known that the English have not much excelled in that kind of literature. He died in 1623, aged 73 years.

WE shall mention the king himself at the end of these English writers; because that is his place, when considered as an author. It may safely be affirmed, that the mediocrity of James's talents in literature, joined to the great change in national taste, is one cause of that contempt under which his memory labours, and which is often carried by party-writers to a great extreme. It is remarkable how different from ours were the sentiments of the ancients with regard to learning. Of the first twenty Roman emperors, counting from Cæsar to Severus, above the half were authors; and though few of them feem to have been eminent in that profession, it is always remarked to their praise, that by their example they encouraged literature. Not to men-tion Germanicus, and his daughter Agrippina, persons. fo nearly allied to the throne, the greater part of the classic writers, whose works remain, were men of the highest quality. As every human advantage is attended with inconveniences, the change of men's ideas in this particular may probably be ascribed to the invention of printing; which has fendered books to common, that even men of slender fortunes can have access to them.

THAT James was but a middling writer may be allowed: That he was a contemptible one, can by no means be admitted. Whoever will read his Bafilicon Doron, particularly the two last books, the true law of fice monarchies, his answer to cardinal Perron, and almost all his speeches and messages to parliament, will confess him to have possessed no mean genius. If he wrote concerning witches and apparitions; who in that age did not admit the rea-liry of these sictitious beings? If he has composed Append a commentary on the Revelations, and proved the pope to be antichrist; may not a similar reproach be extended to the samous Napier; and even to Newton, at a time when learning was much more advanced than during the reign of James? From the grossness of its superstitions, we may infer the ignorance of an age; but never should pronounce concerning the folly of an individual, from his admitting popular errors, consecrated by the appearance of religion.

Such a superiority do the pursuits of literature, possess above every other occupation, that even he who attains but a mediocrity in them, merits the pre-eminence above those that excel the most in the common and vulgar professions. The speaker of the house of commons is usually an eminent lawyer; yet the harangue of his majesty will always be found much superior to that of the speaker, in every par-hament during this reign.

Every science, as well as polite literature, must be considered as being yet in its infancy. Scholastic learning and polemical divinity retarded the growth of all true knowledge. Sir Henry Saville, in the preamble of that deed by which he annexed a salary to the mathematical and astronomical professors in Oxford, says, that geometry was almost totally abandoned and unknown in England. The best learning of that age was the study of the ancients. Casaubon, eminent for this species of knowledge, was invited over from France by James, and encouraged by a pension of 300l. a-year as well as by church preferments. The samous Antonio di Dominis, archbishop of Spalatro, no despicable philosopher, came likewise into England, and afforded great triumph to the nation, by their gaining pendix to chaliderable a proselyte from the papists. But the mortification followed foon after: The archbishop, though advanced to some ecclesiastical preferments?, received not encouragement sufficient to satisfy his ambition: He made his escape into Italy. where he died in confinement.

Rymer, tom. xvii. p. 217. /P Ibid. p. 709.

TORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

9 Rymer, tom. zvii. p. 95-

CHARLES I.

CHAP. L.

A parliament at Westminster—At Oxford ——Naval expedition against Spain -- Second parliament-Impeachment of Buckingham -- V. lent measures of the court -- War with France -- Expedition to the isle of Rhé.

O focuer had Charles taken into his hands the CHAP. reins of government, than he showed an L. impatience to assemble the great council of the nation; and he would gladly, for the take of dispatch, 27th Mar. have called together the fame parliamont which had litten under his father, and which lay at that time under prorogation. But being told that this meafure would appear unufual, he issued writs for fummoning a new parliament on the 7th of May; and A parliait was not without regret that the arrival of the ment at Westminprinces: Henrietta, whom he had espoused by proxy, ster. obliged him to delay, by repeated prorogations, x8th June. their meeting till the eighteenth of June, when they assembled at Westminster for the dispatch of The young prince, unexperienced and impolitic, regarded as fincere all the praises and careffes with which he had been loaded, while active in procuring the rupture with the house of Austria. And besides that he laboured under great necessities, he hastened with alacrity to a period when he might receive the most undoubted testimony of the dutiful attachment of his subjects. His discourse to the .O 4 par-

CHAP parliament was full of simplicity and cordiality.

He lightly mentioned the occasion which he had He lightly mentioned the occasion which he had for supply. He employed no intrigue to influence the suffrages of the members. He would not even allow the officers of the crown who had feats in the house to mention any particular sum which might be expected by him. Secure of the affections of the commons, he was resolved that their bounty should be entirely their own deed; unasked, unsolicited; the genuine fruit of sincere considence and regard.

> THE house of commons accordingly took into confideration the business of supply. They knew that all the money granted by the last parliament had been experided on naval and military armaments; and that great anticipations were likewise made on the revenues of the crown. They were not ignorant that Charles was loaded with a large debt, contracted by his father, who had borrowed money both from his own subjects and from foreign princes. They had learned by experience, that the public revenue could with difficulty maintain the dignity of the crown, even under the ordinary charges of government. They were sensible that the present war was very lately the result of their own importunate applications and entreaties, and that they had folemnly engaged to support their fovereign in the management of it. They were acquainted with the difficulty of military enterprises, directed against the whole house of Austria; against the king of Spain, possessed of the greatest riches and most extensive dominions of any prince in Europe; against the emperor Ferdinand, hitherto the most fortunate monarch of his age, who had subdued and astonished Germany by the rapidity of his vic-Deep impressions, they saw, must be made by the English sword, and a vigorous offenfive war CHAP. be waged against these mighty potentates, ere they would resign a principality, which they had now fully subdued, and which they held in secure posfession, by its being surrounded with all their other territories.

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 171. Parl. Hist. vol. vi. p. 346. Franklyn, p. 108.

To answer, therefore, all these great and important ends; to satisfy their young king in the first request which he made them; to prove their sense of the many royal virtues, particularly economy, with which Charles was endowed; the house of commons, conducted by the wifest and ablest senators that had ever flourished in England, thought proper to confer on the king a supply of two subsidies, amounting to 112,000 pounds's.

This measure, which discovers rather a cruel mockery of Charles than any ferious design of supporting him, appears so extraordinary, when considered in all its circumstances, that it naturally fummons up our attention, and raifes an inquiry concerning the causes of a conduct, unprecedented in an English parliament. So numerous an assembly, composed of persons of various dispositions, was not, it is probable, wholly influenced by the same motives; and few declared openly their true reason. We stall, therefore, approach nearer to the truth, if we mention all the views which the present conjuncture could suggest to them.

IT is not to be doubted, but spleen and ill-will against the duke of Buckingham had an influence with many. So vall and rapid a fortune so little merited could not fail to excite public envy; and, however men's hatred might have been suspended for a moment while the duke's conduct seemed to gratify their passions: and their prejudices, it was impossible for him long to preserve the affections of the people. His influence over the modelly of

Charles

A subsidy was now fallen to about 56,000 pounds. Cabbila, P. 224. first edit.

CII A P. Charles exceeded even that which he had acquired over the weakness, of James; nor was any public measure conducted but by his counsel and direction. His vehement temper prompted him to raise suddenly to the highest elevation his slatterers and dependents: And upon the least occasion of displeafure, he threw them down with equal impetuofity and violence. Implacable in his hatred; fickle in his friendships: All men were either regarded as his enemies, or dreaded foon to become fuch. The whole power of the kingdon was grasped by his insatiable hand; while he both engrossed the intire confidence of his master, and held invested in his fingle person, the most considerable ossices of the crown.

> However the ill-humour of the commons might have been increased by these considerations, we are not to suppose them the sole motives. parliament of James, amidst all their joy and festivity, had given him a supply very disproportioned to his demand and to the occasion. Ait as every house of commons which was elected during forty years, fucceeded to all the passions and principles of their predecessors; we ought rather to account for this obstinacy from the general fituation of the kingdom during that whole period, than from any circumstances which attended this particular conjuncture.

> THE nation was very little accustomed at that time to the burden of taxes, and had never opened their purses in any degree for supporting their sovereign. Even Elizabeth, notwithstanding her vigour and frugality, and the necessary wars in which she was engaged, had reason to complain of the commons in this particular; nor could the authority of that princess, which was otherwise almost absolute, ever extort from them the requisite supplies. bits, more than realon, we find in every thing to he the governing principle of markind. In this view likewife likewise the sinking of the value of subsidies must CHAP. be confidered as a loss to the king. The parliament, fwayed by cultom, would not augment their number in the fame proportion.

2525.

THE puritanical party, though disguised, had a great authority over the kingdom; and many of the leaders among the commons had fecretly embraced the rigid tenets of that fect. All these were diguiled with the court, both by the prevalence of the principles of civil liberty effential to their party, and on account of the reftraint under which they were held by the established hierarchy. In order to fortify himself against the resentment of James, Buckingham had affected popularity, and entered into the cabals of the puritans: But being fecure of the confidence of Charles, he had fince abandoned this party; and on that account was the more expoled to their hatred and resentment. Though the religious lehemes of many of the puritans, when exidained, appear pretty frivolous, we are not thence to imagine that they were purfued by none but performs of weak understandings. Some men of the preatest parts and most extensive knowledge that the nation at this time produced, could not enjoy any pace of mind; because obliged to hear prayers officed up to the Divinity by a priest covered with. a white linen veltment.

The match with France, and the articles in fayour of catholics, which were suspected to be in the treaty, were likewise causes of disgust to this whole party: Though it must be remarked, that the connexions with that crown were much less obnoxious to the protestants, and less agreeable to the catholics, than the alliance formerly projected with Spain, and were therefore received rather with pleafure than diffatisfaction.

To all these causes we must get add another of confiderable moment. The house of commons, we

CHAP. may observe, was almost entirely governed by a set largest views: Men who were now formed into a regular party, and united, as well by fixed aims' and projects, as by the hardships which some of them had undergone in profecution of them. Among these, we may mention the names of sir Edward Coke, sir Edwin Sandys, sir Robert Philips, fir Francis Seymour, fir Dudley Digges, fir John Elliot, fir Thomas Wentworth, Mr. Selden, and Mr. Pym. Animated with a warm regard to liberty, these generous patriots saw with regret an unbounded power exercised by the crown, and were resolved to seize the opportunity which the king's necessities offered them, of reducing the prerogative within more reasonable compass. Though their ancestors had blindly given way to practices and precedents favourable to kingly power, and had been able, notwithstanding, to preserve some small remains of liberty; it would be impossible, they thought, when all these pretensions were methodized, and profecuted by the increasing knowledge of the age, to maintain any shadow of popular government, in opposition to such unlimited authority in the fovereign. It was necessary to fix a choice: Either to abandon entirely the privileges of the people, or to secure them by firmer and more precise barriers than the constitution had hitherto provided for them. In this dilemma, men of fuch aspiring geniuses, and such independent fortunes could not long deliberate: They boldly embraced the side of freedom, and resolved to grant no supplies to their necessitous prince without extorting concessions in favour of civil liberty. The end they esteemed beneficent and noble: The means, regular and constitutional. To grant or refuse supplies was the undoubted privilege of the commons. And as all human governments, particularly those of a mixed frame, frame, are in continual fluctuation, it was as natural CHAP. in their opinion, and allowable, for popular assemblies to take advantage of favourable incidents, in 1625. order to secure the subject; as for the monarchs, in order to extend their own authority. With pleasure they beheld the king involved in a foreign war, which rendered him every day more dependent on the parliament; while at the same time the situa-. tion of the kingdom, even without any military preparations, gave it sufficient security against all invasion from foreigners. Perhaps too, it had partly proceeded from expectations of this nature, that the popular leaders had been so urgent for a rupture with Spain; nor is it credible, that religious zeal could so far have blinded all of them as to make them discover in such a measure any appearance of necessity, or any hopes of success.

But, however natural all these sentiments might appear to the country-party, it is not to be imagined that Charles would entertain the same ideas. Strongly prejudiced in favour of the duke, whom he had heard so highly extolled in parliament, he could not conjecture the cause of so sudden an alteration in their opinions. And when the war which they themselves had so earnestly solicited, was at last commenced, the immediate desertion of their sovereign could not but feem very unaccountable. Even though no farther motive had been suspected, the refusal of supply in such circumstances would naturally to him appear cruel and deceitful: But when he perceived that this measure proceeded from an intention of incroaching on his authority, he failed not to regard these claims as highly criminal and traiterous. Those losty ideas of monarchical power. Which were very commonly adopted during that age, and to which the ambiguous nature of the English constitution gave so plausible an appearance, were firmly riveted in Charles; and, however mo-

II

CHAP. derate his temper, the natural and unavoidable preprecedents in favour of prerogative, had made him regard his political tenets as certain and uncontroverted. Taught to consider even the ancient laws and constitution more as lines to direct his conduct, than barriers to withstand his power; a conspiracy to erect new ramparts in order to straiten his authority appeared but one degree removed from open fedition and rebellion. So atrocious in his eyes was fuch a defign, that he feems even unwilling to such July impute it to the commons: And though he was constrained to adjourn the parliament by reason of the plague, which at that time regid in London; he immediately re-affembled then at Oxford, and made a new attempt to gain from them some sup-

*#August. plies in such an urgent necessity.

Parliament |

CHARLLS now found himself obliged to depart at Oxford. from that delicacy which he had formerly maintained. By himself or his ministers, he entered into a particular detail both of the alliances which he had formed, and of the military operations which he had projected". He told the parliament, that by a promise of subsidies, he had engaged the king of Denmark to take part in the war; that this monarch intended to enter Germany by the north, and to rouse to arms those princes who impatiently longed for an opportunity of afferting the liberty of the empire; that Mansfeldt had undertaken to penetrate with an English army into the Palatinate, and by that quarter to excite the members of the evangelical union; that the States must be supported in the unequal warfare which they maintained with Spain; that no less a sum than 700,000 pounds a-year had been found, by computation, requilite for all these purposes; that the maintenance of the sleet, and the defence of Ireland, demanded an appurate HAP. expence of 400,000 pounds; that he himself had already exhausted and anticipated in the public fer. 1625. vice his whole revenue, and had scarcely left sussicient for the daily subsistence of himself and his family"; that on his accellion to the crown, he found a debt of above 300,000 pounds, contracted by his father in support of the palatine; and that, while prince of Wales, he had himself contracted debts, notwithstanding his great frugality, to the amount of 70,000 pounds, which he had expended entirely on naval and military armaments. After mentioning all these facts, the king even condeseended to use entreaties. He said, that this request was the first that he had over made them; that he was young and in the commencement of his reign; and if he now met with kind and dutiful usage, it would endear to him the use of parliaments, and would for ever preferve an entire harmony between him and his people *.

To these reasons the commons remained inexorable. Notwithstanding that the king's measures, on the supposition of a foreign war, which they had constantly demanded, were altogether unexceptionable, they obstinately resuled any farther aid. Some members favourable to the court having insisted on an addition of two sisteenths to the former supply, even this pittance was resused; though it was known that a sleet and army were lying at Portsmouth in great want of pay and provisions; and that Buckingham, the admiral, and the treasurer of the navy, had advanced on their own credit near a hundred thousand pounds for the sea-service. Besides all their other motives, the house of commons had made

Rush. vol. i. p. 190.

ZaParl, Hift. vol. vi. p. 340.

^{*} Parl. Hist. vol. vi. p. 396.

* Rush. vol. i. p. 177, 178, &c. Parl. Hist. vol. vi. p. 399.
Franklyn, p. 108, 109. Jouin. 10 Aug. 1625.

tence for their refusal, inflamed them against the court and against the duke of Buckingham.

WHEN James deserted the Spanisk alliance, and courted that of France, he had promised to surnish Lewis, who was entirely destitute of naval force, with one ship of war, together with seven armed vessels hired from the merchants. These the French court had pretended they would employ against the Genoese, who being firm and useful allies to the Spanish monarchy, were naturally regarded with an evil eye both by the king of France and of England. When these vessels by Charles's orders arrived at Diepe, there arose a strong suspicion that they were to serve against Rochelle. The sailors were inflamed. That race of men, who are at prefent both careless and ignorant in all matters of religion, were at that time only ignorant. They drew up a remonstrance to Pennington, their commander; and figning all their names in a circle, lest he should discover the ring-leaders, they laid it under his prayer-book. Pennington declared, that he would rather be hanged in England for disobedience, than fight against his brother protestants in France. whole squadron sailed immediately to the Downs. There they received new orders from Buckingham, lord admiral, to return to Diepe'. As the duke knew that authority alone would not suffice, he employed much art and many subtilties to engage them to obedience; and a rumour which was spread that peace had been concluded between the French king and the hugonets, assisted him in his purpose. When they arrived at Diepe they found that they had been deceived. Sir Ferdinando Gorges, who commanded one of the vessels, broke through and returned to England. All the officers and sailors of all the other thips, notwithstanding great offers made them by the French, immediately deferted. gunner alone preferred duty towards his king to the cause cause of religion; and he was afterwards killed in CHAP. charging a cannon before Rochelle. The care which historians have taken to record this frivolous event, proves with what pleasure the news was received by the nation.

1625.

THE house of commons, when informed of these transactions, shewed the same attachment with the failors for the protestant religion; nor was their zeal much better guided by reason and sound policy. It was not confidered, that it was highly probable the king and the duke themselves had here been deceived by the artifices of France, nor had they any hostile intention against the hugonots; that were it otherwise, vet might their measures be justified by the most obvious and most received maxims of civil policy; that if the force of Spain were really so exorbitant as the commons imagined, the French monarch was the only prince that could oppose its progress, and preserve the balance of Europe; that his power was at present fettered by the hugonots, who being possessed of many privileges and even of fortified towns, formed an empire within his empire, and kept him in perpetual jealoufy and inquietude; that an infurrection had been, at that time wantonly and voluntarily formed by their leaders, who, being disgusted in some court intrigue, took advantage of the never-failing pretence of religion, in order to cover their rebellion; that the Dutch, influenced by these views, had ordered a squadron of twenty ships to join the French fleet, employed against the inhabitants of Rochelle'; that the Spanish monarch, sensible of the same consequences, secretly supported the protestants in France; and that all princes had ever facrificed to reasons of state the interests of their religion in soreign countries. All these obvious considerations

had

² Franklyn, p. 109. Rush. vol. i. p. 175, 176, &c 325, 326, &c. b Journ. 18 April 1626.

210

.. 3625.

CHAP. had no influence. Great murmurs and discontents fill prevailed in parliament. The hugonots, though they had no ground of complaint against the French court, were thought to be as much entirled to assistance from England, as if they had taken arms in . defence of their liberties and religion against the persecuting rage of the catholics. And it plainly appears from this incident, as well as from many others, that of all European nations, the British were at that time, and till long after, the most under the influence of that religious spirit which tends rather to inflame bigotry than increase peace and mutual charity.

> On this occasion, the commons renewed their eternal complaints against the growth of popery, which was ever the chief of their grievances, and now their only one . They demanded a strict execution of the penal laws against the catholics, and remonstrated against some late pardons granted to priests d. They attacked Montague, one of the king's chaplains, on account of a moderate book which he had lately published, and which, to their great difgust, saved virtuous catholics, as well as other christians, from eternal torments. Charles gave them a gracious and a compliant answer to all their remonstrances. He was, however, in his · heart, extremely averse to these furious measures. Though a determined protestant by principle as well as inclination, he had entertained no violent horror against popery; and a little humanity, he thought, was due by the nation to the religion of their ancestors. That degree of liberty which is now indulged to catholics, though a party much more obnoxious than during the reign of the Stuarts, it fuited neither with Charles's sentiments, nor the humour of that age, to allow them. An abatement of the more rigorous laws was all he intended; and CHAP. his engagements with France, notwithstanding that L. their regular execution had never been promited or expected, required of him some indulgence. But so unfortunate was this prince, that no measure embraced during his whole reign was ever attended with more unhappy and more fatal consequences.

Franklyn, p. 3, &c.

⁴ Parl. Hift. vol. vi. $74. Journ. z Aug. 1625. * Parl. Hitt. voi. vi. p. 353. Journ. 7 July 1025.

THE extreme rage against popery was a sure characteristic of puritanism. The house of commons discovered other infallible symptoms of the prevalence of that party. They petitioned the king for replacing fuch able clergy as had been filenced for want of conformity to the ceremonies. They also enacted laws for the strict observance of Sunday, which the Puritans affected to call the Sabbath, and which they fanctified by the most melancholy indolence k. It is to be remarked, that the different appellations of this festival were at that time known symbols of the different parties.

THE king finding that the parliament was refolved to grant him no supply, and would furnish him with nothing but empty protestations of duty h, or disagreeable complaints of grievances; took advantage of the plague i, which began to appear at Oxford, and on that pretence immediately dissolved them. By finishing the session with a dissolution, instead of a prorogation, he sufficiently expressed his displeasure at their conduct.

To supply the want of parliamentary aids, Charles Augustiz. issued privy-seals for borrowing money from his Rushworth, vol. i. 181. * TCar. I. cap. i. Journ. 21 3 . 1625 h Franklyn, p. 223. Rushworth, voi. i. P- 190.

I he plague was really so violent, that it had been moved in the house at the preginning of the session, to petition the king to adjourn them. Journ. 21 June 1625. So it was impossible to enter upon Enevances, even it there had been any. The only bulinels of the parliament was to give supply, which was is much wanted by the king, in order to carry on the war in which they had engaged him.

1

CHAP. subjects. The advantage reaped by this expedient was a small compensation for the disgust which it occasioned: By means, however, of that supply, and by other expedients, he was, though

October 1, with difficulty, enabled to equip his fleet. fisted of eighty vessels great and small; and carried on board an army of 10,000 men. Sir Edward

Naval expedition a janult

Cecil, lately created viscount Wimbleton, was intrusted with the command. He sailed immediately for Cadiz, and found the bay full of Spanish ships of great value. He either neglected to attack these ships, or attempted it preposterously. The army was landed and a fort taken: But the undisciplined foldiers, finding store of wine, "could not be restrained from the utmost excesses. Farther stay appearing fruitless, they were reimbarked; and the fleet put to sea with an intention of intercepting the Spanish galleons. But the plague having seized the feamen and soldiers, they were obliged to abandon all hopes of this prize, and return to England. Loud complaints were made against the court for intrusting fo important a command to a man like

Novemb.

Cecil, whom, though he possessed great experience. the people, judging by the event, esteemed of slender capacity '.

1626.

CHARLES, having failed of so rich a prize, was obliged again to have recourse to a parliament. Though the ill success of his enterprises diminished his authority, and shewed every day more plainly the imprudence of the Spanish war; though the increase of his necessities rendered him more dependent, and more exposed to the encroachments of the commons; he was resolved to try once more that regular and constitutional expedient for supply. Perhaps too, a little political art, which at that time he practised, was much trusted to. He had named four popular leaders, theriffs of counties;

Second parliament.

> k Rush. vol. i. p. 192. Parl. Hist. vol. vi. p. 407. Franklyn, p. 113. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 196.

fir Edward Coke, fir Robert Philips, fir Thomas CHAP. Wentworth, and fir Francis Seymour; and, though the question had been formerly much contested in, he thought that he had by that means incapacitated them from being elected members. But his intention being so evident, rather put the commons more upon their guard. Enow of patriots still remained to keep up the ill-humour of the house; and men needed but little instruction or rhetoric to recommend to them practices which increased their own importance and confideration. The weakness of the court also could not more evidently appear than by the being reduced to use so inessectual an expedient, in order to obtain an influence over the commons.

THE views, therefore, of the last parliament were Feb. 6. immediately adopted; as if the same men had been every where elected, and no time had intervened since their meeting. When the king laid before the house his necessities, and asked for supply, they immediately voted him three subsidies and three fifteenths; and though they afterwards added one fubfily more, the sum was little proportioned to the greatness of the occasion, and ill sitted to promote those views of success and glory for which the young prince in his first enterprise so ardently longed. But this circumstance was not the most disagreeable one. The supply was only voted by the commons. The passing of that vote into a law was referved till the end of the session. A condition was thereby made, in a very undifguised manner, with their sovereign. Under colour of redressing grievances, which during this short reign could not be very numerous, they were to proceed in regulating

P.3

m It is always an express clause in the writ of summons, that no theriff shall be chosen; but the contrary practice had often prevailed. D'Ewes, p. 38. Yet still great doubts whre excertained on this head. See journ. 9 April 1614. n Journ. 27 March 1626.

CHAP. gulating and controlling every part of government which displeased them: And if the king either cut them short in this undertaking, or refused compliance with their demands, he must not expect any supply from the commons. Great dissatisfaction was expressed by Charles at a treatment which he deemed so harsh and undutiful. But his urgent necessities obliged him to submit; and he waited with patience, observing to what side they would turn themselves.

Impeachment of Buckingham.

THE duke of Buckingham, formerly obnoxious to the public, became every day more unpopular, by the symptoms which appeared bothers his want of temper and prudence, and of the uncontrolled ascendant which he had acquired over his master 1. Two violent attacks he was obliged this fession to fustain; one from the earl of Bristol, another from the house of commons.

As long as James lived, Bristol, secure of the concealed favour of that monarch, had expressed all duty and obedience; in expectation that an opportunity would offer of reinstating himself in his. former credit and authority. Even after Charles's accession, he despaired not. He submitted to the king's commands of remaining at his country-feat, and of absenting himself from parliament. Many trials he made to regain the good opinion of his master; but finding them all fruitless, and observing Charles to be entirely governed by Buckingham, his implacable enemy, he resolved no longer to keep any measures with the court. A new spirit, he faw, and a new power, arising in the nation; and

· Pailiamentary History, vol. vi. p. 449. Rushworth, vol. i. P. 224

P His credit with the king had given him such influence, that the had no less than swenty proxies granted him this parliament by so many preis; which occasioned a vote, that no peer should have above two proxies. The earl of Leicester in $385 had once ten proxies. D'Ewes, p. 314.

to these he was determined for the future to trust for CHAP.

his fecurity and protection.

WHEN the parliament was summoned, Charles, by a stretch of prerogative, had given orders that no writ, as is cultomary, should be sent to Bristol 9. That nobleman applied to the house of lords by petition; and craved their good offices with the king for obtaining what was his due as a peer of the realm. His writ was sent him, but accompanied with a letter from the lord keeper, Coventry, commanding him in the king's name to ablent himself from parliament. This letter Bristol conveyed to the lords, and asked advice how to proceed in so delicate a fituation. The king's prohibition was withdrawn, and Bristol took his seat. Proveked at these repeated instances of vigour, which the court denominated contumacy, Charles ordered his attorney-general to enter an accusation of high treason against him. By way of recrimination, Bristol accused Buckingham of high treason. Both the earl's defence of himself and accusation of the duke remain *; and, together with some original letters still extant, contain the fullest and most authentic account of all the negotiations with the house of Austria. From the whole, the great imprudence of the duke evidently appears, and the sway of his ungovernable passions; but it would be difficult to collect thence any action which in the eye of the law could be deemed a crime; much less-could subject him to the penalty of treason.

THE impeachment of the commons was still less dangerous to the duke, were it estimated by the standard of law and equity. The house, after having voted upon some queries of Dr. Turner's, that common fame was a sufficient ground of accusation by ⁹ Rushworth, vol. i. p. 236.

^{*} Ibid. vol. i. p. 237. Franklyn, p. 120, &c.

* Rushworth, vol. i. p. 236, 262, 263, &c. Franklyn, p. 123, &c.

* P. 4

CHAP. the kommons', proceeded to frame regular articles against Buckingham. They accused him of having united many offices in his person; of having bought two of them; of neglecting to guard the seas, insomuch that many merchant-ships had fallen intothe hands of the enemy; of delivering ships to the French king in order to serve against the hugonots; of being employed in the sale of honours and offices; of accepting extensive grants from the crown; of procuring many titles of honour for his kindred; and of administering physic to the late king without acquainting his physicians. All these articles appear, from comparing the accusation, and reply, to be either frivolous, or false, or both. The only charge which could be regarded as important was, that he had extorted a fum of ten thouland pounds from the East-India company, and that he had confiscated some goods belonging to French merchants, on pretence of their being the property of Spanish. The impeachment never came to a full determination; so that it is difficult for us to give a decisive opinion with regard to these articles. But it must be confessed, that the duke's answer in these particulars, as in all the rest, is so clear and satisfactory, that it is impossible to refuse our assent to it. faults and blemishes were in many respects very great, but rapacity and avarice were vices with which he was entirely unacquainted.

IT is remarkable that the commons, though so much at a loss to find articles of charge against Buckingham, never adopted Bristol's accusation, or impeached the duke for his conduct in the Spanish treaty, the most blamable circumstance in his whole life. He had reason to believe the Spaniards sincere in their professions; yet, in order to gratify his private passions, he had hurried his master and CHAP. his country into a war pernicious to the interests of both. But so riveted throughout the nation were the prejudices with regard to Spanish deceit and fallehood, that very few of the commons feem as vet to have been convinced that they had been feduced by Buckingham's narrative: A certain proof that a discovery of this nature was not, as is imagined by several historians, the cause of so sudden and furprifing a variation in the measures of the parliament ".

Whitlocke, p. 7.

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 2/7. Whitlocke, p. 5.

^{*} Rushworth, vol. idp. 306, &c. 375, &c. Journ. 25 March 1626.

While the commons were thus warmly engaged against Buckingham, the king seemed desirous of embracing every opportunity by which he could express a contempt and disregard for them. No one was at that time sufficiently sensible of the great weight which the commons bore in the balance of The history of England had the constitution. never hitherto afforded one instance where any great movement or revolution had proceeded from the lower house. And as their rank, both considered in a body and as individuals, was but the second in the kingdom; nothing less than fatal experience could engage the English princes to pay a due regard to the inclinations of that formidable affembly.

THE earl of Suffolk, chancellor of the university of Cambridge, dying about this time, Buckingham, though lying under impeachment, was yet, by means of court-interest, chosen in his place. The commons refented and loudly complained of this affront; and the more to enrage them, the king himself wrote a letter to the university, extolling the duke, and giving them thanks for his election".

THE lord-keeper, in the king's name, expressly commanded the house not to meddle with his minister and servant, Buckingham; and ordered them gun for the subsidies, and to make some addition to them; otherwise they must not expect to sit any longer. And though these harsh commands were endeavoured to be explained and mollished, a sew days after, by a speech of Buckingham's, they sailed not to leave a disagreeable impression behind them.

[&]quot; See note [T] at the end of the volume.

W Rushworth, vol. i. p. 371.

Bestdes a more stately style which Charles in general affected to this parliament than to the last, he went so far in a message, as to threaten the commons, that if they did not furnish him with supplies, he should be obliged to try receiveunsits. This language was fufficiently clear: Yet, left any ambiguity should remain, sir Dudley Carleton, vicechamberlain, took care to explain it. "I pray you " consider," said he, " what these new counsels are, or may be. I fear to declare those that I conceive. In all Christian kingdoms, you know "that parliaments were in use antiently, by which " those kingdoms were governed in a most flou-" rishing manner; until the monarchs began to "know their own strength, and seeing the turbulent spirit of their parliaments, at length they by " little and little began to stand on their preroga-46 tives, and at last overthrew the parliaments, 42 throughout Christendom, except here only with " us.—I et us be careful then to preserve the "king's good opinion of parliaments, which bringeth fuch happiness to the nation, and makes us envied of all others, while there is this sweetness between his majesty and the commons; lest we " lose the repute of a free people by our turbulency " in parliament"." These imprudent suggestions rather gave warning than struck terror. A preca-

* Ruspworth, vol. i. p. 355. Whitlocke, p. 6.

^{*} Parl. Hift. vol. vi. p. 444+1

y Id. ibid. p. 421. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 225. Franklyn, p. 118.

rious liberty, the commons thought, which was to CHAP. be preserved by unlimited complaisance, was no liberty at all. And it was necessary, while yet in their power, to secure the constitution by such invincible barriers, that no king or minister should ever, for the future, dare to speak such a language to any parliament, or even entertain such a project against them.

Two members of the house, sir Dudley Digges and fir John Elliott, who had been employed as managers of the impeachment against the duke, were thrown into prison. The commons immediately declared, that they would proceed no farther upon business, till they had satisfaction in their privileges. Charles alleged, as the reason of this measure, certain feditious expressions, which, he said, had, in their acculation of the duke, dropped from these members. Upon inquiry it appeared that no fuch expressions had been used b. The members were released, and the king maped no other benefit from this attempt than to exasperate the house still farther, and to shew some degree of precipitancy and judiferetion.

Moved by this example, the house of peers were roused from their inactivity; and claimed liberty for the earl of Arundel, who had been lately confined in the Tower. After many fruitless evalions, the king, though somewhat ungracefully, was at last obliged to comply. And in this incident it fufficiently appeared, that the lords, how little fo ever inclined to popular courses, were not wanting in a just sense of their own dignity.

The ill-humour of the commons, thus wantonly irritated by the court, and finding no gratification in the legal impeachment of Buckinghim, fought other objects on which it might exert itself. The ^{*} Ruthworth, vol. i. p. 356.

Id. ibid. p. 358. 364. Franklyn, h. 180.

CHAP. never-failing cry of popery here served them in stead. They again claimed the execution of the penal laws against catholics; and they presented to the king a lift of persons intrusted with offices, most of their infignificant, who were either convicted or fuspected recusants d. In this particular, they had, perhaps, some reason to blame the king's conduct. He had promised to the last house of commons a redress of this religious grievance: But he was apt, in imitation of his father, to imagine that the parliament, when they sailed of supplying his necesfities, had, on their part, freed him from the obligation of a strict performance. A new odium, likewise, by these representations, was attempted to be thrown upon Buckingham. His mother, who had great influence over him, was a professed catholic; his wife was not free from suspicion: And the indulgence given to catholics was of course supposed to proceed entirely from his credit and authority. So violent was the bigotry of the times, that it was thought a sufficient reason for disqualifying any one from holding an office, that his wife, or relations or companions were papists, though he himself was a conformist .

It is remarkable, that perfecution was here chiefly pushed on by laymen; and that the church was willing to have granted more liberty than would be allowed by the commons. The reconciling doctrines likewise of Montague failed not anew to meet with severe censures from that zealous assembly.

The next attack made by the commons, had it prevailed, would have proved decisive. They were preparing a remonstrance against the levying of tonnage and poundage without consent of parliament. This article, together with the new impositions laid on merchandise by James, constituted

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 209.

Franklyn, p. 195. Rushworth.

e See the list in Franklyn and Rushworth.

near half of the crown-revenues; and by depriving the king of these resources, they would have reduced him to total subjection and dependence. While they retained such a pledge, besides the supply already promised, they were sure that nothing could be resuled them. Though after canvassing the matter near three months, they sound themselves utterly incapable of fixing any legal crime upon the duke, they regarded him as an unable and perhaps a dangerous minister; and they intended to present a petition, which would then have been equivalent to a command, for removing him from his majesty's person and councils .

The king was alarmed at the yoke which he faw prepared for him. Buckingham's fole guilt, he thought, was the being his friend and favourite b. All the other complaints against him were mere pretences. A little before, he was the idol of the people. No new crime had fince been discovered. After the most diligent inquiry, prompted by the greatest malice, the smallest appearance of guilt could not be fixed upon him. What idea, he asked, must all mankind entertain of his honour, should he facrifice his innocent friend to pecuniary considerations? What farther authority should he retain in the nation, were he capable, in the beginning of his reign, to give, in so signal an instance, such matter of triumph to his cuemies, and discouragement to his adherents? Fo-day the commons pretend to wrest his minister from him. To-morrow they will attack some branch of his prerogative. By their remonstrances, and promises, and protestations, they had engaged the crown in a war. As foon as they faw a retreat impossible, without waiting for new incidents, without covering themselves with new pretences, they immediately detraced him, and refused him all reason; by tapply. It was evi-

h Franklyn, p. 178.

g Rushworth, vol. i. p. 400.

CHAP dent, that they defired nothing so much as to see him plunged in inextricable difficulties, of which they intended to take advantage. To such deep perfidy, to such unbounded usurpations, it was necessary to oppose a proper firmness and resolution. All encroachments on supreme power could only be resisted successfully on the first attempt. The sovereign authority was, with some difficulty, reduced from its ancient and legal height; but when once pushed downwards, it soon became contemptible, and would easily, by the continuance of the same effort, now encouraged by fuccess, be carried to the lowest extremity.

> PROMPTED by these plausible motives, Charles was determined immediately to dissolve the parliament. When this resolution was known, the house of peers, whose compliant behaviour entitled them to some authority with him, endeavoured to interpose i; and they petitioned him, that he would allow the parliament to fit some time longer. Not a moment longer, cried the king hastily k; and he soon after ended the session by a dissolution.

As this measure was foreseen, the commons took care to finish and disperse their remonstrance, which they intended as a justification of their conduct to the 15th June. people. The king, likewise, on his part, published a declaration, in which he gave the reasons of his disagreement with the parliament, and of their sudden dissolution, before they had time to conclude any one act. These papers furnished the partisans on both sides with ample matter of apology or of recrimina-But all impartial men judged 66 commens, though they had not as yet violated " any law, yet, by their unpliableness and independ-" ence, were infenfibly changing, perhaps improving, the spirit and genius, while they preserved

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 398!

E Sanderson's Lite of Chatles I. p. 58. 1 Finklyn, p. 203, &c. Farl. hutt. vol. vii. p. 300.

the form of the constitution: And that the king CHAP.
was acting altogether without any plan; running on in a road furrounded on all sides with the "most dangerous precipices, and concerting no proper measures, either for submitting to the ob-

" stinacy of the commons, or for subduing it."

AFTER a breach with the parliament, which feemed fo difficult to repair, the only rational counfel which Charles could purfue, was, immediately to conclude a peace with Spain, and to render himself, as far as possible, independent of his people, who discovered so little inclination to support him, or rather who feem to have formed a determined refolution to abridge his authority. Nothing could be more eafy in the execution than this measure, nor more agreeable to his own and to national interest. But, besides the treaties and engagements which he had entered into with Holland and Denmark, the king's thoughts were at this time averse to pacific counsels. There are two circumstances in Charles's character, feemingly incompatible, which attended him during the whole courfe of his reign, and were in part the cause of his misfortunes: He was very steady and even obstinate in his purpose; and he was eafily governed, by reason of his facility, and of his deference to men much inferior to himself both in morals and understanding. His great ends he inflexibly maintained: But the means of attaining them he readily received from his ministers and favourites, though not always fortunate in his choice. The violent, impetuous Buckingham, inflamed with a desire of revenge for injuries which he himself had committed, and animated with a love of glory which he had not talents to merit, had at this time, notwithstanding his profuse licentious life, acquired an invincible afcendant over the virtuous and gentle temper of the king.

THE new counsels, which Charles had mentioned to the parliament, were now to be tried, in order to supply his necessities. Had he possessed any military force, on which he could rely, it is not improbable, that he had at once taken off the mask, and governed without any regard to parliamentary privileges: So high an idea had he received of kingly prerogative, and so contemptible a notion of the rights of those popular assemblies, from which, he very naturally thought, he had met with such ill usage. But his army was new levied, ill paid, and worse disciplined; no-wise superior to the militia, who were much more numerous, and who were in a great measure under the influence of the countrygentlemen. It behoved him, therefore, to proceed cautiously, and to cover his enterprises under the pretence of ancient precedents, which, considering the great authority commonly enjoyed by his predecessors, could not be wanting to himself.

fupply

Violent meafures of the court.

A commission was openly granted, to compound with the catholics, and agree for dispensing with the penal laws enacted against them ". By this expedient, the king both filled his coffers, and gratified his inclination of giving indulgence to these religionists: But he could not have employed any branch of prerogative which would have been more disagreeable, or would have appeared more exceptionable to his protestant subjects.

FROM the nobility he desired assistance: the city he required a loan of 100,000 pounds. The former contributed flowly: But the latter, covering themselves under many pretences and excuses, gave him at last a flat refusal "...

In order to equip a fleet, a distribution, by order of council, was made to all the maritime towns; and each of them was required, with the assistance of the adjacent counties, to arm so many vessels as were appointed them °. The city of London was rated at twenty ships,) This is the first appearance in Charles's reign, of ship-money; a taxation which CHAP. had once been imposed by Elizabeth, but which afterwards, when carried some steps farther by 1626. Charles, created such violent discontents.

Rushworth, vol.i. p. 413. Whitlocke, p. 7. · Rushworth, ut supra. i. p. 415. Franklys, p. 206.

Or some loans were required?: To others the way of benevolence was proposed: Methods supported by precedent, but always invidious, even in times more submissive and compliant. In the most absolute governments such expedients would be regarded as irregular and unequal.

THESE counsels for supply were conducted with fome moderation; till news arrived that a great battle was fought between the king of Denmark and count Tilly, the Imperial general; in which the 25th Aug. former was totally defeated. Money now, more than ever, became necessary, in order to repair so great a breach in the alliance, and to support a prince who was fo nearly allied to Charles, and who had been engaged in the war chiefly by the intrigues, solicitations, and promises of the English monarch. After some deliberation; an act of council was passed, importing, that as the urgency of affairs admitted not the way of parliament, the most speedy, equal, and convenient method of supply was by a. GENERAL LOAN from the subject, according as every man was affested in the rolls of the last subsidy. That precise sum was required which each would have paid, had the vote of four subsidies passed into a law: But care was taken to inform the people, that the sums exacted were not to be called subsidies, but loans 4. Had any doubt remained, whether forced loans, however authorised by precedent, and even by statute, were a violation of liberty, and must, by necessary consequence, render all parliaments superfluous; this was the proper expedient for opening the eyes of the whole nation. The example

P Rushworth, vol. i. p. 416.
9 Ibid. p. 418. Whitlocke, p. 8.

Vol. VI.

reign, practifed a like method of levying a regular fupply, was generally deemed a very insufficient authority.

THE commissioners appointed to levy these loans, among other articles of secret instruction, were enjoined, "If any shall refuse to lend, and shall make delays or excuses, and persist in his obstinacy, that they examine him upon oath, whether he has been dealt with to deny or refuse to lend, or make an excuse for not lending? Who has dealt with him, and what speeches or persuasions were used to that purpose? And that they also shall charge every such person, in his majesty's name, upon his allegiance, not to disclose to any one what his answer was "." So violent an inquisitorial power, so impracticable, an attempt at secrecy, were the objects of indignation, and even, in some degree, of ridicule.

THAT religious prejudices might support civil authority, sermons were preached by Sibthorpe and Manwaring, in favour of the general loan; and the court industriously spread them over the kingdom. Passive obedience was there recommended in its full extent, the whole authority of the flate was reprefented as belonging to the king alone, and all limitations of law and a constitution were rejected as seditions and impious. So openly was this doctrine espoused by the court, that archbishop Abbot, a popular and virtuous prelate, was, because he refuled to licence Sibthorpe's sermon, suspended from the exertise of his office, banished from London, and confined to one of his country seats. Abbot's principles of liberty, and his opposition to Buckingham, had always rendered him very ungracious at Rushworth, vol. i. p. 419. Franklyn, p. 207. S. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 422. Franklyn, p. 203.

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 431.

court, and had acquired him the character of a pu- CHAP. ritan. For it is remarkable, that this party made L. the privileges of the nation as much a part of their religion, as the church party did the prerogatives of the crown; and nothing tended farther to recommend among the people, who always take opinions in the lump, the whole system and all the principles of the former sect. The king soon found, by fatal experience, that this engine of religion, which with so little necessity was introduced into politics, falling under more fortunate management, was played with the most terrible success against him.

WHIEE-the king, instigated by anger and necesfity, thus employed the whole extent of his prerogative, the spirit of the people was far from being fubdued. Throughout England, many refused these loans; some were even active in encouraging their neighbours to insist upon their common rights and By warrant of the council these were privileges. thrown into prison ". Mostof them with patience submitted to confinement, or applied by petition to the king, who commonly released them. Five gentlemen alone, sir Thomas Darnel, sir John Corbet, fir Walter Earl, fir John Heveningham, and fir Edmond Hambden, had spirit enough, at their own hazard and expence, to defend the public liberties, and to demand releasement, not as a favour from the court, but as their due, by the laws of their country . No particular cause was assigned of their commitment. The special command alone of the king and council was pleaded; and it was afferted, that, by law, this was not sufficient reason for refusing bail or releasement to the prisoners.

This question was brought to a solemn trial be- November. fore the king's bench; and the whole kingdom was [&]quot;Rushworth, vol. i. p. 429. Franklyn, p. 210.

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 458. Franklyn, p. 224. Whitlocke, p. 8.

CHAP. attentive to the issue of a cause, which was of much greater consequence than the event of many battles.

By the debates on this subject it appeared, beyond controverly, to the nation, that their ancestors had been to jealous of personal liberty, as to secure it against arbitrary power in the crown, by fix " several statutes, and by an article " of the GREAT CHARTER itself, the most sacred foundation of the laws and constitution. But the kings of England, who had not been able to prevent the enacting of these laws, had sufficient authority, when the tide of liberty was spent, to obstruct their regular execution; and they deemed it superfluous to attempt the formal repeal of statutes which they found so many expedients and pretences to clude. Turbulent and feditious times frequently occurred, when the fafety of the people absolutely required the confinement of factious leaders; and by the genius of the old constitution, the prince, of himself, was accustomed to assume every branch of prerogative, which was found necessary for the preservation of public peace and of his own authority. Expediency at other times would cover itself under the appearance of necessity; and, in proportion as precedents multiplied, the will alone of the fovereign was fufficient fupply the place of expediency, of which he constituted himself the sole judge. In an age and nation where the power of a turbulent nobility prevailed, and where the king had no fettled military force, the only means that could maintain public peace, was the exertion of such prompt and discretionary powers in the crown; and the public itself had become so sensible of the necessity, that those ancient laws in favour of personal liberty, while often violated, had never been challenged or revived,

5

³⁷ Edw. III. w 25 Edw. III. cap. 44 28 Fdw. III. cap. 3. 38 Edw. Hl. cap. 9 42 Edw. III. cap. 3. 1 Richard II. . * Chap. 29. during

during the course of near three centuries. Though CHAP. rebellious subjects had frequently, in the open field, L. resisted the king's authority; no person had been found so bold, when confined and at mercy, as to set himself in opposition to regal power, and to claim the protection of the constitution against the will of the fovereign. It was not till this age, when the spirit of liberty was universally diffused, when the principles of government were nearly reduced to a lystem, when the tempers of men, more civilized, seemed less to require those violent exertions of prerogative, that thefe five gentlemen above mentioned, by a noble effort, ventured, in this national cause, to bring the question to a final determination. And the king was altonished to observe, that a power exercifed by his predecessors, almost without interruption, was found, upon trial, to be directly opposite to the clearest laws, and supported by few undoubted precedents in courts of judicature. These had scarcely, in any instance, refused bail upon commitments by special command of the king; because the persons committed had seldom or never dared to

Sir Randolf Crew, chief justice, had been displaced, as unfit for the purposes of the court: Sir Nicholas Hyde, esteemed more obsequious, had obtained that high office: Yet the judges, by his direction, went no farther than to remand the gentlemen to prison, and resule the bail which was offered. Heathe, the attorney-general, insisted, that the court, in imitation of the judges in the 34th of Elizabeth 2, should enter a general judgment, that no bail could be granted, upon a commitment by the king or council. But the judges wisely declined complying. The nation, they saw, was already to the last degree exasperated. In the present disposition

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 462.

State Trials, ibid. p. 261.

State Trials, vol. vii. p. 147.

prevailed, as if the kingdom were reduced to flavery. And the most invidious prerogative of the crown, it was said, that of imprisoning the subject, is here openly and solemnly, and in numerous instances, exercised for the most invidious purpose; in order to extort loans, or rather subsidies, without consent of parliament.

But this was not the only hardship of which the nation then thought they had reason to complain. The army, which had made the fruitless expedition to Cadiz, was dispersed throughout the kingdom; and money was levied upon the counties for the payment of their quarters base

THE soldiers were billeted upon private houses, contrary to custom, which required that, in all ordinary cases, they should be quartered in inns and public houses.

Those who had refused or delayed the loan, were sure to be loaded with a great number of these dangerous and disorderly guests.

Many too, of low condition, who had shown a refractory disposition, were pressed into the service, and inlisted in the sleet or army. Sir Peter Hayman, for the same reason, was dispatched on an errand to the Palatinate. Glanville, an eminent lawyer, had been obliged, during the former interval of parliament, to accept of an office in the navy.

THE foldiers, ill paid and undisciplined, committed many crimes and outrages, and much increased the public discontents. To prevent these disorders, martial law, so requisite to the support of discipline, was exercised upon the soldiers. By a contradiction, which is natural when the people are exasperated, the outrages of the army were complained of; the remedy was thought still more inb Rushworth, vol. i. p. 419.

d Ihid, p. 422 4 c lbid, p. 431.

f Parl, Hut. vol. vii. p. 310.

tolerable. Though the expediency, if we are not CHAP. rather to fay the necessity of martial law, had formerly been deemed, of itself, a sufficient ground for establishing it; men, now become more jealous of liberty, and more refined reasoners in questions of government, regarded as illegal and arbitrary, every exercise of authority which was not supported by express statute or uninterrupted precedent.

Ir may fafely be affirmed, that, except a few courtiers or ecclesiastics, all men were displeased with this high exertion of prerogative, and this new spirit of administration. Though ancient precedents were pleaded in favour of the king's measures; a considerable difference, upon comparison, was obferved between the cases. Acts of power, however irregular, might cafually, and at intervals, be exercifed by a prince, for the fake of dispatch or expediency; and yet liberty still subsist in some tolerable degree under his administration. But where all these were reduced into a system, were exerted Without interruption, were studiously sought for, in order to supply the place of laws, and subdue the refractory spirit of the nation, it was necessary to find fome speedy remedy, or finally to abandon all hopes of preferging the freedom of the constitution. Nor did moderate men esteem the provocation which the king had received, though great, sufficient to warrant all these violent measures. The commons, as yet, had no-wife invaded his authority: They had only exercised, as best pleased them, their own privileges. Was he justifiable, because from one house of parliament he had met with harsh and unkind treatment, to make in revenge an invasion on the rights and liberties of the whole nation?

Bur great was at this time the surprise of all men, when Charles, bailled in every attempt against

E Rushworth, vol. i. p. 419. Whitlocke, p. 7.

War with France.

CHAP. the Austrian dominions, embroiled with his own subjects, unsupplied with any treasure but what he extorted by the most invidious and most dangerous measures; as if the half of Europe, now his enemy, . were not sufficient for the exercise of military prowefs; wantonly attacked France, the other great kingdom in his neighbourhood, and engaged at once in war against these two powers, whose interests were hitherto deemed fo incompatible, that they could never, it was thought, agree either in the fame friendships or enmities. All authentic memoirs, both foreign and domestic, ascribe to Buckingham's counsels, this war with France, and represent him as actuated by motives, which would appear incredible, were we not acquainted with the violence and temerity of his charecter.

THE three great manarchies of Europe were at this time ruled by young privous, Pholip, Lewis, and Charles, who were nearly of the lame age, and who had refigned the government of themselves, and of their kingdoms, to their creatures and ministers, Olivarez, Richelieu, and Buckingham. The people, whom the moderate temper or narrow genius of their princes would have allowed to remain for ever in tranquillity, were strongly agitated by the emulation and jealouly of the ministers. Above all, the towering spirit of Richelieu, incapable of rest, promised an active age, and gave indications of great revolutions throughout all Europe.

This man had no foorer, by suppleness and intrigue, gotten possession of the reins of government, than he formed at once three mighty projects; to fubdue the turbulent spirits of the great, to reduce the rebellious hugonots, and to curb the encroaching power of the house of Austria. Undamnted and implacable, prudent and active, he braved all the opposition of the French princes and nobles in the profecution of his vengeance; he discovered

and

and dissipated all their secret cabals and conspiracies. C HAP. he exalted the throne. The people, while they lost their liberties, acquired, by means of his administration, learning, order, discipline, and renown. That confused and inaccurate genius of government, of which France partook in common with other European kingdoms, he changed into a simple monarchy; at the very time when the incapacity of Buckingham encouraged the free spirit of the commons to establish in England a regular system of liberty.

However unequal the comparison between these ministers, Buckingham had entertained a mighty jealousy against Richelieu; a jealousy not founded on rivalship of power and politics, but of love and gallantry; where the duke was as much superior to the cardinal, as he was inferior in every other particular.

AT the time when Charles married by proxy the princess Henrietta, the duke of Buckingham had been sent to France, in order to grace the nuptials, and conduct the new queen into England. eyes of the French court were directed by curiosity towards that man, who had enjoyed the unlimited favour of two fuccessive monarchs, and who, from a private station, had mounted in the earliest youth to the absolute government of three kingdoms. The beauty of his person, the gracefulness of his air, the splendour of his equipage, his fine aste in dress, festivals, and carousals, corresponded to the prepossessions entertained in his favour: The affability of his behaviour, the gaiety of his manners, the magnificence of his expence, increased still farther the general admiration which was paid him. All business being already concerted, the time was entirely spent in mirth and entertainments; and, during those splendid scenes among that gay people, the duke found himself in a situation where he was perfectly perfectly qualified to excel h. But his great success at Paris proved as fatal as his former failure at Madrid. Encouraged by the imiles of the court, he dared to carry his ambitious addresses to the queen herself; and he failed not to make impression on a heart not undisposed to the tender passions. That attachment, at least of the mind, which appears so delicious, and is so dangerous, seems to have been encouraged by the princess; and the duke presumed so far on her good graces, that, after his departure, he secretly returned upon some pretence, and, paying a visit to the queen, was dismissed with a reproof-which savoured more of kind-

Information of this correspondence was soon carried to Richelieu. The vigilance of that minister was here farther roused by jealousy. He too, either from vanity or politics, had ventured to pay his addresses to the queen. But a priest, past middle age, of a severe character, and occupied in the most extensive plans of ambition or vengeance, was but an unequal match in that contest, for a young courtier, entirely disposed to gaiety and gallantry. The cardinal's disappointment strongly inclined him to counterwork the amorous projects of his rival. When the duke was making preparations for a new embassy to Paris, a message was sent him from Lewis, that he must not think of such a journey. In a romanic passion he swore, That he rould fee the queen, in spite of all the power of France; and, from that moment, he determined to engage England in a war with that kingdom k.

HE first took advantage of some quarrels excited by the queen of England's attendants; and he perfuaded Charles to dismiss at once all her French servants, contrary to the articles of the marriage ness than of anger i.

A Clarendon, vol. i. p. 38, i Memoires de Mad. de Motteville.

^{*} Clasendon, voi. 1. p. 38.

treaty. He encouraged the English ships of war CHAP. and privateers to seize vessels belonging to French merchants; and these he forthwith condemned as -prizes, by a sentence of the court of admiralty. But finding that all these injuries produced only remonstrances and embassies, or at most reprisals, on the part of France, he resolved to second the intrigues of the duke of Soubize, and to undertake at once a military expedition against that kingdom.

Soubize, who, with his brother the duke of Rohan, was the leader of the hugonot faction, was at that time in London, and strongly solicited Charles to embrace the protection of these distressed religionists. He represented, that after the inhabitants of Rochelle had been repressed by the combined fquadrons of England and Holland, after peace was concluded with the French king under Charles's mediation, the ambitious cardinal was still meditating the destruction of the hugonots; that preparations were filently making in every province of France for the suppression of their religion; that forts were erected in order to bridle Rochelle, the most considerable bulwark of the protestants; that the reformed in France cast their eyes on Charles as the head of their faith, and considered him as a prince engaged by interest, as well as inclination, to support them; that, so long as their party substitted, Charles might rely on their attachment as much as on that of his own subjects; but if their liberties were once ravished from them, the power of France, freed from this impediment, would foon become formidable to England, and to all the neighbouring nations.

Titough Charles probably bore but small favour to the hugonots, who so much resembled the puritans in discipline and worship, in religion and politics, he yet allowed himself to be gained by these oth July. Expedition to the ille of Khé.

¹ Rushworth, vol. i. p. 423, 424.

CHAP. arguments, enforced by the folicitations of Buckingham. A fleet of a hundred fail, and an army of 7000 men, were fitted out for the invalion of France, and both of them entrusted to the command of the duke, who was altogether unacquainted both with land and fea-service. The fleet appeared before Rochelle; but so ill-concerted were Buckingham's measures, that the inhabitants of that city shut their gates, and refused to admit allies, of whose coming they were not previously informed in. All his military operations shewed equal incapacity and inexperience. Instead of attacking Oleron, a fertile island and defenceless, he bent his course to the isle of Rhé, which was well garrisoned and fortified: Having landed kis men, though with some loss, he followed not the blow, but allowed Toiras, the French governor, five days respite; during which St. Martin was victualled and provided for a slege". He left behind him the small fort of Prie, which could at first have made no manner of resistance: Though resolved to starve St. Martin, he guarded the fea negligently, and allowed provisions and ammunition to be thrown into it: Despairing to reduce h by famine, he attacked it without having made any breach, and rashly threw away the lives of the foldiers: Having found that a French army had stolen ever in small divisions, and had landed at Prie, the fort which he had at first overlooked, he Offob. 28. began to think of a retreat; but made it fo unskilfully, that it was equivalent to a total rout: He was the last of the army that embarked; and he returned to England, having lost two-thirds of his land-forces; totally discredited both as an admiral and a general; and bringing no praise with him, but the vulgar one of courage and personal bravery.

THE duke of Rohan, who had taken arms as soon as Buckingham appeared upon the coast, dif-

m Rushworth, vol. i., p. 426.

[&]quot; Whitlocke, p. 8. Sir Philip Warwick, p. 25.

covered the dangerous spirit of the sect, without being C H A P. able to do any mischies: The inhabitants of Rochelle, who had at last been induced to join the English, hasterned the vengeance of their master, exhausted their provisions in supplying their ailies, and were threatened with an immediate siege. Such were the fruits of Buckingham's expedition against France.

CHÀP. LI.

Third parliament—Petition of right—Prorogation—Death of Buckingham—New Scission of parliament—Tonnage and poundage—Arminianism-Dissolution of the parliament.

CHAP HERE was reason to apprehend some disorder or insurrection from, the discontents which prevailed among the people in England. liberties, they believed, were ravished from them; illegal taxes extorted; their commerce, which had met with a severe check from the Spanish, was totally annihilated by the French war; those military honours transmitted to them from their ancestors had received a grievous stain by two unfuccessful and ill-conducted expeditions; scarce an illustrious family but mourned, from the last of them, the loss of a fon or brother; greater calamities were dreaded from the war with these powerful monarchies, concurring with the internal disorders under which the nation-laboured. And these ills were ascribed, not to the refractory disposition of the two former parliaments, to which they were partly owing; but folely to Charles's obstinacy, in adhering to the counsels of Buckingham; a man nowise intitled, by his birth, age, services, or merit, to that unlimited considence reposed in him. To be sacrificed to the interest, policy, and ambition of the great, is so much the common lot of the people, that they may appear unreasonable who would pretend to complain of it: But to be the victim of the frivolous gallantry of a favourite, and of his boyish caprices, feemed the object of peculiar indignation.

IN

In this situation, it may be imagined, the king CHAP. and the dake dreaded above all things the assemble. bling of a parliament: But so little foresight had they possessed in their enterprising schemes, that they found themseives under an absolute necessity of embracing that expedient. The money levied, or rather extorted, under colour of prerogative, had come in very flowly, and had left fuch ill-humour in the nation, that it appeared dangerous to renew the experiment. The absolute necessity of supply, it was hoped, would engage the commons to forget all past injuries; and, having experienced the ill effects of former obstinacy, they would probably assemble with a resolution of making some reasonable compliances. The inore to soften them, it was concerted, by fir Robert Cotton's advice', that Buckingham should be the first person that proposed in council the calling of a new parliament. Having laid in this stock of merit, he expected that Thirdpar. all his former misdemeanors would be overlooked liament. and forgiven; and that, instead of a tyrant and oppressor, he should be regarded as the first patriot in · the nation.

THE views of the popular leaders were much more judicious and profound. When the commons March 17. assembled, they appeared to be men of the same independent spirit with their predecessors, and possessed of fuch riches, that their property was computed to surpass three times that of the house of peers p; they were deputed by boroughs and counties, enflamed all of them by the late violations of liberty; many of the members themselves had been cast into prison, and had suffered by the measures of the court; yet, notwithstanding these circumstances, which might prompt them to embrace violent resolutions, they entered upon business with perfect

[•] Franklyn, p. 230.

P Sanderion, p. 106. Walker, p. 339.

CHAP. temper and decorum. They considered, that the king, difgusted at these popular assemblies, and little prepossessed in favour of their privileges, wanted z628. but a fair pretence for breaking with them, and would seize the first opportunity offered by any incident, or any undutiful behaviour of the members. He fairly told them in his first speech, that, " if "they should not do their duties, in contributing 46 to the necessities of the state, he must, in discharge of his conscience, use those other means which God had put into his hands, in order to fave that which the follies of some particular men may otherwise put in danger. Take not this for a "threatening," added the king, "for I fcorn to threaten any but my equals; but as an admonistion from him who, by nature and duty, has most care of your preservation and prosperity "." The lord keeper, by the king's direction, subjoined, "This way of parliamentary supplies, as his majesty so told you, he hath chosen, not as the only way, but as the fittest; not because he is destitute of others, but because it is most agreeable to the goodness of 44 his own most gracious disposition, and to the de-" " fire and weal of his people. If this be deferred, or necessity and the sword of the enemy make way for the others. Remember his majesty's admo-" nition; I say, remember it "." From these avowed maxims, the commons forefaw that, if the least handle were afforded, the king would immediately dissolve them, and would thenceforward deem himself justified for violating, in a manner still more open, all the ancient forms of the constitution. No remedy could then be looked for, but from insurrections and civil war, of which the issue would be extremely uncertain, and which must, in all events, prove calamitous to the nation. To correct the late disorders in the administration required some new laws which would, no doubt, appear harsh to a prince so enamoured of his prerogative; and it was requisite to temper, by the decency and moderation of their debates, the rigour which must necessarily attend their determinations. Nothing can give us a higher idea of the capacity of those men who now guided the commons, and of the great authority which they had acquired, than the forming and executing of so judicious and so difficult a plan of operations.

⁹ Rushworth, vol. i. p. 477. Franklyn. p. 233.

THE decency, however, which the popular leaders had prescribed to themselves, and recommended to others, hindered them not from making the loudest and most vigorous complaints against the grievances under which the nation had lately laboured. Sir Francis Seymour said, "This is the great council " of the kingdom, and here with certainty, if not " here only, his majesty may see as in a true glass, " the state of the kingdom. We are called hither " by his writs, in order to give him faithful coun-" fel, fuch as may stand with his honour: And "this we must do without flattery. We are also " sent hither by the people, in order to deliver their " just grievances: And this we must do without. " fear. Let us not act like Cambyses's judges, "who, when their approbation was demanded by " the prince to some illegal measure, said, that, "Though there was a written law, the Persian kings " might follow their own will and pleasure. This " was base flattery, sitter for our reproof than our " imitation; and as fear, so flattery, taketh away "the judgment. For my part, I shall shun both; "and speak my mind with as much duty as any man to his majesty, without neglecting the e public.

"But how can we express our affections, while "we retain our fears; or speak of giving, till we know whether we have any thing to give? For Vol. VI.

CHAP. " if his majesty may be persuaded to take what he will, what need we give?

3528.

"THAT this hath been done, appeareth by the billeting of foldiers, a thing nowife advantageous to the king's service, and a burden to the commonwealth: By the imprisonment of gentlemen for refusing the loan, who, if they had done the contrary for fear, had been as blameable as the projectors of that oppressive measure. To countenance these proceedings, hath it not been preached in the pulpit, or rather prated, that All we have is the king's by divine right? But when preachers for sake their own calling, and turn ignorant statesmen; we see how willing they are to exchange a good conscience for a bishopric.

"He, I must confess, is no good subject, who would not, willingly and cheerfully, lay down his life, when that facrifice may promote the interests of his sovereign, and the good of the commonwealth. But he is not a good subject, he is a slave, who will allow his goods to be taken from him against his will, and his liberty against the laws of the kingdom. By opposing these practices, we shall but tread in the steps of our foresathers, who still preferred the public before their private interest, nay, before their very lives. It will in us be a wrong done to ourselves, to our posterities, to our consciences, if we forego this claim and pretension."

"I READ of a custom," said sir Robert Philips, among the old Romans, that, once every year, they held a solemn festival in which their slaves had liberty, without exception, to speak what they pleased, in order to ease their asslicted minds, and, on the conclusion of the festival, the slaves severally returned to their former servitudes.

Franklyn, p. 243. Rufhworth, vol. i. p. 499.

This institution may, with some distinction, CHAP.
well set forth our present state and condition.

After the revolution of some time, and the 1628.

" grievous sufferance of many violent oppressions,

we have now, at last, as those slaves, obtained,

" for a day, some liberty of speech: But shall not,

"I trust, be hereafter slaves: For we are born free. Yet, what stew illegal burdens our estates and per-

" fons have groaned under, my heart yearns to think

" of, my tongue faulters to utter.

"THE grievances, by which we are oppressed, "I draw under two heads; acts of power against "law, and the judgments of lawyers against our " liberty."

HAVING mentioned three illegal judgments passed within his memory; that by which the Scots, born after James's accession, were admitted to all the privileges of English subjects; that by which the new impositions had been warranted; and the late one, by which arbitrary imprisonments were authorised; he thus proceeded:

"I can live, though another, who has no right, be put to live along with me; nay, I can live,

"though burdened with impositions, beyond what at present I labour under: But to have my liberty,

"which is the soul of my life, ravished from me;

"to have my person pent up in a jail, without relief by law, and to be so adjudged,—O, improvident "ancestors! O, unwisc forefathers! to be so curious in providing for the quiet possession of our lands, and the liberties of parliament; and, at the same

"time, to neglect our personal liberty, and let us

"lie in prison, and that during pleasure, without redress or remedy! If this be law, why do we talk of liberties? Why trouble ourselves with disputes about a constitution, franchises, property of goods and the like? What may any man call his own, if not the liberty of his person?

R 2

IAM

CHAP LI.

1628.

"I AM weary of treading these ways; and therefore conclude to have a select committee, in order to frame a petition to his majesty for redress of these grievances. And this petition being read,

" examined, and approved, may be delivered to the king; of whose gracious answer we have no cause

" to doubt, our desires being so reasonable, our " intentions so loyal, and the manner so dutiful.

Neither need we fear, that this is the critical par" liament, as has been infinuated; or that this is

"the way to distraction: But assure ourselves of a happy issue. Then shall the king, as he calls us

" his great council, find us his true council, and own

" us his good council "."

The same topics were enforced by sir Thomas. Wentworth. After mentioning projectors and ill ministers of state, "These," said he, "have in-"troduced a privy-council, ravishing, at once, the spheres of all ancient government; destroying all liberty; imprisoning us without bail or bond. They have taken from us—What shall I say? Indeed, what have they left us? By tearing up the roots of all property, they have taken from us every means of supplying the king, and of ingratiating ourselves by voluntary proofs of our

"duty and attachment towards him.
"To the making whole all these breaches, I shall apply myself; and, to all these diseases, shall propound a remedy. By one and the same thing have the king and the people been hurt, and by the same must they be cured. We must vindicate: What? New things? No: Our ancient, legal, and vital liberties; by reinforcing the laws enacted by our ancestors; by setting such a stamp upon them, that no licentious spirit shall dare thenceforth to invade them. And shall we think

t Franklyn, p. 245. Parl. Hist. vol. vii. p. 363. Ruseworth, vol. i. p. 502.

this a way to break a parliament? No: Our de. CHAP. fires are modest and just. I speak both for the " interest of king and people. If we enjoy not

46 these rights, it will be impossible for us to relieve

"him. Let us never, therefore, doubt of a fa-

"." vourable reception from his goodness "."

These fentiments were unanimously embraced by the whole house. Even the court party pretended not to plead in defence of the late measures, any thing but the necessity to which the king had been reduced, by the obstinacy of the two former parlia-A vote, therefore, was passed without opposition against arbitrary imprisonments and forced loans w. And the spirit of liberty having obtained some contentment by this exertion, the reiterated messages of the king, who pressed for supply, were attended to with more temper. Five subsidies were voted him; with which, though much inferior to his wants, he declared himself well sätissied; and even tears of affection started in his eye, when he was informed of this concession. The duke's approbation too was mentioned by secretary Coke; but the conjunction of a subject with the sovereign was ill received by the house *. Though disgusted with the king, the jealousy which they felt for his honour was more sensible than that which his unbounded confidence in the duke would allow even himself to entertain.

THE supply, though voted, was not, as yet, passed into a law; and the commons resolved to employ the interval, in providing some barriers to their rights and liberties so lately violated. They knew that their own vote, declaring the illegality of the former measures, had not, of itself, sufficient authority to secure the constitution against future invasion.

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 526. Whitlocke, p. 9.

u Franklyn, p. 343. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 500.

[&]quot;Franklyn, p. 251. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 513. Whitlocke, p. 9.

right.

CHAP. Some act to that purpose must receive the fanction of the whole legislature; and they appointed a committee to prepare the model of fo important a law. By collecting into one effort all the dangerous and oppressive claims of his prerogative, Charles had exposed them to the hazard of one assault; and had farther, by presenting a nearer view of the consequences attending them, roused the independent genius of the commons. Forced loans, benevolences, taxes without consent of parliament, arbitrary imprisonments, the billeting of soldiers, martial law; these were the grievances complained of, and against these an eternal remedy was to be provided. The commons pretended not, as they affirmed, to any unusual powers or privileges: They aimed only at securing those which had been transmitted them from their ancestors: And their law Petition of they resolved to call a Petition of Right; as implying that it contained a corroboration or explanation of the ancient constitution, not any infringement of royal prerogative, or acquisition of new liberties.

WHILE the committee was employed in framing the petition of right, the favourers of each party, both in parliament and throughout the nation, were engaged in disputes about this bill, which, in all likelihood, was to form a memorable æra in the English government.

THAT the statutes, said the partisans of the commons, which secure English liberty, are not become obsolete, appears hence, that the English have ever been free, and have ever been governed by law and a limited constitution. Privileges in particular, which are founded on the GREAT CHARTER, must always remain in force, because derived from a source of never-failing authority; regarded in all ages, as the most sacred contract between king and people. Such attention was paid to this charter by our generous ancestors, that they got the confirmation of it reiterated reiterated thirty several times; and even secured it CHAP. by a rule, which, though vulgarly received, seems in the execution impracticable. They have established it as a maxim, That even a statute, which should be enacted in contradiction to any article of that charter, cannot have force or validity. But with regard to that important article which secures personal liberty; so far from attempting, at any time, any legal infringement of it, they have corroborated it, by fix statutes, and put it out of all doubt and controversy. If in practice it has often been violated, abuses can never come in the place of rules; nor can any rights or legal powers be derived from injury and injustice. But the title of the subject to perfonal liberty not only is founded on ancient, and therefore the most sacred laws: It is consirmed by the whole Analogy of the government and constitution. A free monarchy in which every individual is a flave, is a glaring contradiction; and it is requisite, where the laws assign privileges to the different orders of the state, that it likewise secure the independence of the members. If any difference could be made in this particular, it were better to abandon even life or property to the arbitrary will of the prince; nor would such immediate danger ensue, from that concession, to the laws and to the privileges of the people. To bereave of his life a man not condemned by any legal trial, is fo egregious an exercise of tyranny, that it must at once shock the natural humanity of princes, and convey an alarm throughout the whole commonwealth. To confiscate a man's fortune, besides its being a most atrocious act of violence, exposes the monarch so much to the imputation of avarice and rapacity, that it will feldom be attempted in any civilized government. But confinement, though a less striking, is no less severe a punishment; nor is there any spirit so erect and independent, as not to be broken by the long continuance of the filent and inglorious fufferings R 4

¥628,

CHAP. sufferings of a jail. The power of imprisonment, therefore, being the most natural and potent engine of arbitrary government, it is absolutely necessary to remove it from a government which is free and legal. *

THE partifans of the court reasoned after a different manner. The true rule of government, said they, during any period, is that to which the people, from time immemorial, have been accustomed, and to which they naturally pay a prompt obedience. A practice which has ever struck their senses, and of which they have feen and heard innumerable precedents, has an authority with them much superior to that which attends maxims derived from antiquated statutes and mouldy records. In vain do the lawyers establish it as a principle, that a statute can never be abrogated by opposite custom; but requires to be expressly repealed by a contrary statute: While they pretend to inculcate an axiom peculiar to English jurisprudence, they violate the most established principles of human nature; and even, by necessary consequence, reason in contradiction to law itself, which they would reprefent as fo facred and inviola-A law, to have any authority, must be derived from a legislature, which has right. And whence do all legislatures derive their right but from long custom and established practice? If a statute contrary to public good, has, at any time, been rashly voted and assented to, either from the violence of faction, or the inexperience of senates and princes, it cannot be more effectually abrogated, than by a train of contrary precedents, which prove, that, by common consent, it has tacitly been set aside, as inconvenient and inspracticable. Such has been the case with all those statutes enacted during turbulent times, in order to limit royal prerogative, and cramp the fovereign in his protection of the public, and his execution of the laws. But above all branches of prerogative, that which is most necessary to be preserved, is the power of imprisonment.

ment. Faction and discontent, like diseases, fre. CHAP. quently ærise in every political body; and during these disorders, it is by the salutary exercise alone of this discretionary power, that rebellions and civil wars can be prevented. To circumscribe this power is to destroy its nature: Entirely to abrogate it, is impracticable; and the attempt itself must prove dangerous if not pernicious to the public. The supreme magistrate, in critical and turbulent times, will never, agreeably either to prudence or duty, allow the state to perish, while there remains a remedy, which, how irregular soever, it is still in his power to apply. And if, moved by a regard to public good, he employs any exercise of power condeinned by recent and express statute, how greedily, in such dangerous times, will factious leaders seize this pretence of throwing on his government the imputation of tyranny and despotism? Were the alternative quite necessary, it were surely much better for human society to be deprived of liberty than to be destitute of government.

IMPARTIAL reasoners will confess, that this subject is not, on both fides, without its difficulties. Where a general and rigid law is enacted against arbitrary * imprisonment, it would appear, that government cannot, in times of sedition and faction, be conducted but by temporary suspensions of the law; and such an expedient was never thought of during the age of Charles. The meetings of parliament were too precarious, and their determinations might be too dilatory, to serve in cases of urgent necessity. Nor was it then conceived, that the king did not possess of himself sufficient power for the security and protection of his people, or that the authority of these popular assemblies was ever to become so absolute, that the prince must always conform himself to it, and could never have any occasion to guard against their practices, as well as against those of his other subjects.

THOUGH

C H A P. LI.

Though the house of lords was not insensible to the reasons urged in favour of the pretensions of the commons, they deemed the arguments pleaded in favour of the crown still more cogent and convincing. That affembly feems, during this whole period, to have acted, in the main, a reasonable and a moderate part; and if their bias inclined a little too much, as is natural, to the side of monarchy, they were far from entertaining any design of facrificing to arbitrary will the liberties and privileges of the nation. Ashley, the king's serjeant, having afferted, in a pleading before the peers, that the king must sometimes govern by acts of state as well as by law; this position gave such offence, that he was immediately committed to prison, and was not released but upon his recantation and submission v. Being, however, afraid lest the commons should go too far in their projected petition, the peers proposed a plan of one more moderate, which they recommended to the consideration of the other house. It consisted merely in a general declaration, that the great charter, and the six statutes conceived to be explanations of it, stand still in force, to all intents and purposes; that, in consequence of the charter and the statutes, and by the tenor of the ancient customs and laws of the realm, every subject has a fundamental property in his goods, and a fundamental liberty of his person; that this property and liberty are as entire at present as during any former period of the English government; that in all common cases, the common law ought to be the standard of proceedings: in case, that, for the security of his majesty's " person, the general safety of his people, or the " peaceable government of the kingdom, the king " shall find just cause, for reasons of slate, to im-" prison or restrain any man's person; he was petitioned graciously to declare, that, within a convenient.time, he shall and will express the cause CHAP. of the commitment or restraint, either general or special, and upon a cause so expressed, will e leave the prisoner immediately to be tried ac" cording to the common law of the land 2."

ARCHBISHOP Abbot was employed by the lords to recommend, in a conference, this plan of a petition to the house of commons. The prelate, as was; no doubt, foreseen from his known principles, was not extremely urgent in his applications; and the lower house was fully convinced that the general declarations fignified nothing, and that the latter clause lest their liberties rather in a worse condition than before. They proceeded, therefore, with great zeal, in framing the model of a petition, which should contain expressions more precise, and more favourable to public freedom.

THE king could eafily see the consequence of these proceedings. Though he had offered, at the beginning of the fession, to give his consent to any law for the fecurity of the rights and liberties of the people; he had not expected that fuch inroads would be made on his prerogative. In order, therefore, to divert the commons from their intention, he sent a message, wherein he acknowledged past errors, and promised that, hereafter, there should be no just cause of complaint. And he added, "That the affairs of the kingdom press " him so, that he could not continue the session " above a week or two longer: And if the house be not ready, by that time, to do what is fit for " themselves, it shall be their own fault"." On a subsequent occasion, he asked them, "Why de-" mand explanations, if you doubt not the per-" formance of the statutes, according to their true " meaning? Explanations will hazard an encroach-

a State Trials, vol. vii. p. 193.

Z State Trials, vol. vii. p. 187. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 546.

i ELI. 2628.

CHAP. " ment upon the prerogative. And it may well " be faid, What need a new law to confirm an old, " if you repose considence in the declarations which "his majesty made to both houses "?" The truth is, the great charter and the old statutes were sufficiently clear in favour of personal liberty: But as all kings of England had ever, in cases of necessity or expediency, been accustomed, at intervals, to elude them; and as Charles, in a complication of instances, had lately violated them; the commons judged it requisite to enact a new law, which might not be eluded or violated, by any interpretation, construction, or contrary precedent. Nor was it fufficient, they thought, that the king promifed to return into the way of his predecessors. His predecessors, in all times, had enjoyed too much discretionary power; and by his recent abuse of it, the whole world had reason to see the necessity of entirely retrenching it.

THE king still persevered in his endeavours to elude the petition. He fent a letter to the house of lords, in which he went fo far as to make a particular declaration, "That neither he nor his privycouncil shall or will, at any time hereafter, com-" mit or command to prison, or otherwise re-" strain, any man for not lending money, or for " any other cause, which in his conscience he sthought not to concern the public good, and "the fafety of king and people." And he farther declared, "That he never would be guilty of fo base an action as to pretend any cause, " of whose truth he was not fully satisfied "." But this promise, though enforced to the commons by the commendation of the upper house, made no more impression than all the former mesfages, b State Trials, vol. vii. p. 196. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 556. State Trials, vol. vii. p. 198. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 560. Park Hist, vol. viii. p. xxx.

Among the other evasions of the king, we may reckon the proposal of the house of peers, to subjoin, to the intended petition of right, the following clause: "We humbly present this petition to your majesty, not only with a care of preserving our own liberties, but with due regard to leave entire that fovereign power, with which your majesty is entrusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of your people "." Less penetration than was possessed by the leaders of the house of commons, could easily discover how captious this clause was, and how much it was calculated to elude the whole force of the petition.

THESE obstacles, therefore, being surmounted, the petition of right passed the commons and was fent to the upper house. The peers, who were probably well pleased in secret that all their solicitations had been eluded by the commons, quickly passed the petition without any material alteration; and nothing but the royal affent was wanting to give it the force of a law. The king accordingly came to the house of peers; sent for the commons; and, being feated in his chair of state, the petition was read to him. Great was now the aftonishmen's of all men, when, instead of the usual concise and clear form, by which a bill is either confirmed or rejected, Charles said, in answer to the petition, "The king willeth, that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm, and that " the statutes be put into execution; that his sub-" jects may have no cause to complain of any wrong or oppression, contrary to their just rights " and liberties, to the preservation whereof he holds "himself in conscience as much obliged as of his " own prerogative "."

State Trials, vol. vii. p. 199. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 561.
Pail. Hist. vol. viii. p. 126. Whitlocke, p. 10. Che note
[U] at the end of the volume.

State Trials, vol. vii. p. 212.
Rushworth, vol. i. p. 599.

CHAP. It is surprising that Charles, who had seen so many instances of the jealousy of the commons, who had himself so much roused that jealousy by his frequent evalive messages during this session, could imagine that they would rest satisfied with an answer so vague and undeterminate. It was evident, that the unufual form alone of the answer must excite their attention; that the disappointment must inflame their anger; and that therefore it was neceffary, as the petition feemed to bear hard on royal prerogative, to come early to some fixed resolution, either gracefully to comply with it, or courageously to reject it.

Ir happened as might have been foreseen. The commons returned in very ill humour. Usually, when in that disposition, their zeal for religion, and their enmity against the unfortunate catholics, ran extremely high. But they had already, in the beginning of the session, presented their petition of religion, and had received a satisfactory answer; though they expected that the execution of the laws against papists would, for the future, be no more exact and rigid, than they had hitherto found it. To give vent to their present indignation, they fell with their utmost force on Dr. Man-waring.

THERE is nothing which tends more to excuse, if not justify, the extreme rigour of the commons towards Charles, than his open encouragement and avowal of such general principles as were altogether incompatible with a limited government. Manwaring had preached a fermon, which the commons found, upon inquiry, to be printed by special command of the king ; and, when this fermon was looked into, it contained doctrines subverfive of all civil liberty. It taught, that though property was commonly lodged in the subject, yet,

LI.

1628.

whenever any exigency required supply, all pro- CHAP. perty was transferred to the sovereign; that the confent of parliament was not necessary for the imposition of taxes; and that the divine laws required compliance with every demand, how irregular foever, which the prince should make upon his subjects h. For these doctrines the commons impeached Manwaring. The fentence, pronounced upon him by the peers, was, that he should be imprisoned during the pleasure of the house, be fined a thousand pounds to the king, make submission and acknowledgment of his offence, be suspended during three years, be incapable of holding any ecclesiastical dignity or fecular office, and that his book be called in and burnt i.

IT may be worthy of notice, that no sooner was the session ended, than this man, so justly obnoxious to both houses, received a pardon, and was promoted to a living of considerable value k. Some years after, he was raised to the see of St. Asaph. If the republican spirit of the commons increased, beyond all reasonable bounds, the monarchical spirit of the court; this latter, carried to so high a pitch, tended still farther to augment the former. And thus extremes were every where affected, and the just medium was gradually deserted by all men.

From Manwaring, the house of commons, proceeded to censure the conduct of Buckingham, whose name hitherto they had cautiously forborn to mention. In vain did the king send them a mesfage, in which he told them, that the session was drawing near to a conclusion; and desired, that they would not enter upon new business, nor cast any aspersions on his government and ministry. Though the court endeavoured to explain

h Rushworth, vol. i. p. 585. 594. Parl. Hift. vol. viii. p. 168, 169, 170. &c. Welwood, p. 44. . Rushworth, vol. i. p. 65. Parl. Hift. vol. viii. p. 212. k Rushworth, vol. i. p. 635. Whitlocke, p. 11. 1 Rushworth, sol. i. p. 607. Vol. i. p. 605.

CHAP. and soften this message by a subsequent message"; as _ Charles was apt hastily to correct any hasty step -1628. which he had taken; it served rather to inslame than appeale the commons: As if the method of their proceedings had here been prescribed to them. It was foreseen, that a great tempest was ready to burst on the duke; and in order to divert it, the king thought proper, upon a joint application of the lords and commons, to endeavour giving them satisfaction with regard to the petition of right. He came therefore to the house of peers, and pronouncing the usual form of words, Let it be law as is defired, gave full fanction and authority to the petition. The acclamations with which the house resounded, and the universal joy diffused over the nation, shewed how much this petition had been the object of all men's vows and expectations.

> IT may be affirmed, without any exaggeration, that the king's assent to the petition of right produced such a change in the government, as was almost equivalent to a revolution; and by circumscribing, in so many articles, the royal prerogative, gave additional security to the liberties of the subject. Yet were the commons far from being satisfied with this important concession. Their ill-humour had been so much irritated by the king's frequet evasions and delays, that it could not be presently appealed by an affent, which he allowed to be so reluctantly extorted from him. Perhaps too, the popular leaders, implacable and artful, faw the opportunity favourable; and, turning against the king those very weapons with which he had furnished them, resolved to pursue the victory. The bill, however, for five subsidies, which had been formerly voted, immediately passed the house, because

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 610. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 197.

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 613. Journ. 7th June 1628. Parl. Hist.

vol. viii. p. 201.

P Rushworth, vol. i. p. 613.

cause the granting of that supply was, in a manner, tacitly contracted for, upon the royal assent to the petition; and had faith been here violated, no farther considence could have subsisted between king and parliament. Having made this concession, the commons continued to carry their scrutiny into every part of government. In some particulars their industry was laudable; in some it may be liable to censure.

A LITTLE after writs were issued for summoning this parliament, a commission had been granted to fir Thomas Coventry, lord keeper, the earl of Marlborough, treasurer, the earl of Manchester, president of the council, the earl of Worcester, privy-seal, the duke of Buckingham, high admiral, and all the confiderable officers of the crown; in the whole, thirty-three. By this commission, which, from the number of persons named in it, could be no fecret, the commissioners were empowered to meet and to concert among themselves the methods of levying money by impositions, or otherwise; Where form and circumstance, as expressed in the commission, must be dispensed with, rather than the substance be lest or hazarded v. In other words, this was a scheme for finding expedients, which might raife the prerogative to the greatest height, and render parliaments entirely uleless. The commons applied for cancelling the commission 1; and were, no doubt, defirous that all the world should conclude the king's principles to be extremely arbitrary, and should observe what little regard he was disposed to pay to the liberties and privileges of his people.

A commission had likewise been granted, and some money remitted, in order to raise a thousand German horse, and transport them into England.

P Rush. vol. i. p. 614. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 214.

⁹ Journ. 13 June 1628.

CHAP. These were supposed to be levied, in order to support the projected impositions or excises; though the number seems insufficient for such a purpose'. The house took notice of this design in severe terms: And no measure, surely, could be projected' more generally odious to the whole nation. It mult, however, be confessed that the king was so far right, that he had now at last fallen on the only effectual method for supporting his prerogative. But at the same time he should have been sensible that, till provided with a fufficient military force, all his attempts, in opposition to the rising spirit of the nation, must, in the end, prove wholly fruitless; and that the higher he screwed up the springs of government, while he had so little real power to retain them in that forced fituation, with more fatal violence must they fly out, when any accident occurred to restore them to their natural action.

•The commons next refumed their censure of Buckingham's conduct and behaviour, against whom they were implacable. They agreed to present a remonstrance to the king, in which they recapitulated all national grievances and misfortunes, and omitted no circumstance which could render the whole administration despicable and odious. compositions with catholics, they said, amounted to no less than a toleration, hateful to God, full of difhonour and disprosit to his majesty, and of extreme scandal and gricf to his good people: They took notice of the violations of liberty above mentioned, against which the petition of right seems to have provided a sufficient remedy: They mentioned the decay of trade, the unfuccessful expeditions to Cadiz and the isle of Rhé, the encouragement given to Arminians, the commission for transporting German horse, that for levying illegal impositions; and all these grievances they ascribed solely to the ill-conduct of the duke of Buckingham. This CHAP. remonstrance was, perhaps, not the less provoking to Charles, because, joined to the extreme acri-, mony of the hibject, there were preserved in it, as in most of the remonstrances of that age, an affected civility and fubmission in the language. And as it was the first return which he met with for his late beneficial concessions, and for his facrifices of prerogative, the greatest by far ever made by an English fovereign, nothing could be more the object of just and natural indignation.

Ir was not without good grounds that the commons were to herce and affuming. Though they had already granted the king the supply of five subfidies, they still retained a pledge in their hands, which they thought enfured them fuccess in all their applications. Tonnage and poundage had not yet been granted by parliament; and the commons had artfully, this fession, concealed their intention of invading that branch of revenue, till the royal affent had been obtained to the petition of right, which they justly deemed of such importance. They, then openly afferted, that the levying of tonnage ton poundage without consent of parliament, was a pale pable violation of the ancient liberties of the people, and an open infringement of the petition of right, so lately granted. The king, in order to prevent the finishing and presenting of this remon- Proroga-Grance, came fuddenly to the parliament, and ended tion. this fession by a prorogation ".

Being freed for some time from the embarrassment of this assembly, Charles began to look towards foreign wars, where all his efforts were equally unfuccessful, as in his domestic government. The earl of Denbigh, brother-in-law to Buckingham,

· S 2

was 26th June.

^{&#}x27; Rush. vol. i. p. 619. Puil. Hist. vol, viii. p. 219, 220, &c.

Ruth. vol. i. p. 628. Journ. 18, 20 June 1628. " Journ, 26 June 1628.

CHAP. was dispatched to the relief of Rochelle, now closely besieged by land, and threatened with a blockade by fea: But he returned without effecting any thing; and having declined to attack the enemy's fleet, he brought on the English arms the imputation either of cowardice or ill-conduct. In order to repair this dishonour, the duke went to Portsmouth, where he had prepared a confiderable fleet and army, on which all the subsidies given by parliament had been expended. This supply had very much disappointed the king's expectations. The fame mutinous spirit which prevailed in the house of commons, had diffused itself over the nation; and the commissioners appointed for making the affeilments, had connived at all frauds which might diminish the supply, and reduce the crown to Ilill greater necessities. This national discontent, communicated to a desperate enthusiast, soon broke out in an event, which may be confidered as remarkable.

> THERE was one Felton, of a good family, but of an ardent, melancholic temper, who had ferved under the duke in the station of lieutenant. His captain being killed in the retreat at the isle of Rhé, Felton had applied for the company; and when disappointed, he threw up his commission, and retired in discontent from the army. While private resentment was boiling in his sullen, unsociable mind, he heard the nation resound with complaints against the duke; and he met with the remonstrance of the commons, in which his enemy was reprefented as the cause of every national grievance, and as the great enemy of the public. Religious fanaticism farther inflamed these vindictive reslections; and he fancied that he flould do heaven acceptable fervice, if, at one blow, he dispatched this dangerous foe to religion and to his country ". Full of these dark views he secretly arrived at Portsmouth, at the same time with the duke, and watched for an opportunity CHAP.

May's Hist. of the Parliament, p. 10.

of effecting his bloody purpofe.

BUCKIN HAM had been engaged in conversation with Soubize and other French gentlemen; and a 23d Aug. difference of fer iment having arilen, the dispute, though conducted with temper and decency, had produced some of the evenent gesticulations and lively exertions of voice, in which that nation, more than the English, are ope to indulge themselves. The conversation being finished, the duke drew towards he door; and in that passage, turning himfelf to speak to sir Thomas Fryar, a colonel in the army, he was, on the fudden, over fir Thomas's shoulder, struck upon the breast with a knife. Without uttering other words than The villain has Death of killed me; in the same moment pulling out the Buckingknife, he breathed his last.

No man had seen the blow, nor the person who gave it; but in the confusion, every one made his own conjecture; and all agreed that the murder had been committed by the French gentlemen, whose angry tone of voice had been heard, while their words had not been understood by the bystanders. In the hurry of revenge, they had instantly been put to death, had they not been faved by fome of more temper and judgment, who, though they had the same opinion of their guilt, thought proper to referve them for a judicial trial and examination.

NEAR the door there was found a hat, in the inside of which was sewed a paper, containing four or five lines of that remonstrance of the commons, which declared Buckingham an enemy to the kingdom; and under these lines was a short ejaculation, or attempt towards a prayer. It was eafily concluded that this hat belonged to the affailin: But the difficulty still remained, Who that person should be? For the writing discovered not the name; and Whoever he was, it was natural to believe that he

CHAP. had already fled far enough not to be found without a hat.

1628.

In this hurry, a man without a hat was feen walking very composedly before the door. One crying out, Here is the fellow who killed the duke; every body ran to ask, Which is he? The man very sedately answered, I am he. The more furious immediately rushed upon him with drawn swords: Others, more deliberate, desended and protected him: He himself, with open arms, calmly and cheerfully exposed his breast to the swords of the most enraged; being willing to fall a sudden facrifice to their anger, rather than be reserved for that public justice which, he knew, must be executed upon him.

HE was now known to be that Felton who had ferved in the army. Being carried into a private room, it was thought proper so far to dissemble as to tell him, that Buckingham was only grievously wounded, but not without hopes of recovery. Felton smiled, and told them, that the duke, he knew, full well, had received a blow which had terminated all their hopes. When asked, at whose instigation he had performed that horrid deed? he replied, that they needed not to trouble themselves in that inquiry; that no man living had credit enough with him to have disposed him to such an action; that he had not even entrusted his purpose to any one; that the resolution proceeded only from himfelf, and the impulse of his own conscience; and that his motives would appear, if his hat were found: For that believing he should perish in the attempt, he had there taken care to explain them *.

When the king was informed of this assassination, he received the news in public with an unmoved and undisturbed countenance; and the courtiers, who CHAP. studied his looks, concluded, that fecretly he was not displeased to be rid of a minister so generally odious to the nation y. But Charles's command of himself proceeded entirely from the gravity and composure of his temper. He was still, as much as ever, attached to his favourite; and, during his whole life, he retained an affection for Buckingham's friends, and a prejudice against his enemies. He urged too, that Felton should be put to the question, in order to extort from him a discovery of his accomplices: But the judges declared, that though that practice had formerly been very usual, it was altogether illegal. So much more exact reasoners, with regard to law, had they become, from the jealous scruples of the house of commons.

^{*} Clasendon, vol. i. p. 27, 28.

MEANWHILE the distress of Rochelle had rifen to the utmost extremity. That vast genius of Richelieu, which made him form the greatest enterprises, led him to attempt their execution by means equally great and extraordinary. In order to deprive Rochelle of all fuccour, he had dared to project the throwing across the harbour a mole of a mile's extent in that boifterous ocean; and having executed his project, he now held the town closely blockaded on all fides. The inhabitants, though preffed with the greatest rigours of famine, still refused to submit; being supported, partly by the lectures of their zealous preachers, partly by the daily hopes of relief from England. After Buckingham's death, the command of the fleet and army was conferred on the earl of Lindesey; who, arriving before Rochelle, made fome attempts to break through the mole, and force his way into the harbour: But by the delays of the English, that work was now fully finished and fortified; and the Rochellers, finding 18th Oct.

CHAP, their last hopes to fail them, were reduced to surrender at discretion, even in fight of the English Of fifteen thousand persons shut up in the city, four thousand alone survived the fatigues and famine which they had undergone 2.

This was the first necessary step towards the prosperity of France. Foreign enemies, as well as domestic factions, being deprived of this resource, that kingdom began now to shine forth in its sull splen-By a steady prosecution of wife plans both of war and policy, it gradually gained an ascendant over the rival power of Spain; and every order of the state, and every sect, were reduced to pay submission to the lawful authority of the sovereign. The victory, however, over the hugonots, was at first pushed by the French king with great modera-A toleration was still continued to them; the only avowed and open toleration which, at that time, was granted in any European kingdom.

1629.

20th Jan. Newlession of parliament.

THE sailure of an enterprise, in which the English nation, from religious sympathy, so much interested themselves, could not but diminish the king's au-•thority in the parliament during the approaching fession: But the commons, when assembled, found many other causes of complaint. . Buckingham's conduct and character with some had afforded a reason, with others a pretence, for discontent against public measures: But after his death, there wanted not new reasons and new pretences for general distatisfaction. Manwaring's pardon and promotion were taken notice of: Sibthorpe and Cosins, two clergymen, who, for like reasons, were no less obnoxious to the commons, had met with like favour from the king: Montague, who had been censured for moderation towards the catholics, the greatest of crimes, had been created bishop of Chichester. They found, likewise, upon inquiry, that all the copies of the petition of right, which were dispersed, had, by the king's CHAP. orders, annexed to them the first answer, which had ______LI. given so little satisfaction to the commons. expedient by which Charles endeavoured to perfuade the people that he had nowife receded from his former claims and pretentions, particularly with regard to the levying of tonnage and poundage. Selden also complained in the house, that one Savage, contrary to the petition of right, had been punished with the loss of his ears, by a discretionary or arbitrary senter e of the star-chamber b. So apt were they, on their part, to stretch the petition into such conseque als as might deprive the crown of powers, which, from immemorial cultom, were supposed inherent in it.

² Rush. vol. i. p. 636,

But the great article on which the house of com- Tonnage mons broke with the king, and which finally created and in Charles a difgust to all parliaments, was their poundage. claim with regard to tonnage and poundage. this occasion, therefore, it is necessary to give an account of the controverly.

THE duty of tonnage and poundage, in more ancient times, had been commonly a temporary grant of parliament; but it had been conferred on Henry V. and all the fucceeding princes, during life, in order to enable them to maintain a naval. force for the defence of the kingdom. The necesfity of levying this duty had been so apparent, that each king had ever claimed it from the moment of his accession; and the first parliament of each reign had usually, by vote, conferred on the prince what they found him already in possession of. Agreeably to the inaccurate genius of the old constitution, this abuse, however considerable, had never been perceived nor remedied; though nothing could have been easier than for the parliament to have pre-

² State Trials, vol. vii. p. 216. Rush. wol. i. p. 643.

^{*} State Trials, vol. vn. p. 216. Part. Hitt. vol. vin. p. 246.

CHAP. vented it . By granting this duty to each prince, during his own life, and, for a year after his demise, to the successor, all inconveniencies had been obviated; and yet the duty had never for a moment been levied without proper authority. But contrivances of that nature were not thought of during those rude ages: And as so complicated and jealous a government as the English cannot subsist without many fuch refinements; it is cafy to fee how favourable every inaccuracy must formerly have proved to royal authority, which on all emergencies was obliged to supply, by discretionary power, the great deficiency of the laws.

THE parliament did not grant the duty of tonnage and poundage to Henry VIII. till the fixth of his reign: Yet this prince, who had not then railed his power to its greatest height, continued, during that whole time, to levy the imposition: The parliament, in their very grant, blame the merchants who had neglected to make payment to the crown; and though one expression of that bill thay seem ambiguous; they employ the plainest terms in calling tonnage and poundage the king's due, even before that duty was conferred on him by parlia-mentary authority. Four reigns, and above a whole century, had fince elapsed; and this revenue had still been levied before it was voted by parliament. So long had the inaccuracy continued, without being remarked or corrected.

During that fhort interval which passed between Charles's accession and his first parliament, he had followed the example of his predecessors; and no fault was found with his conduct in this particular. But what was most remarkable in the proceedings of that house of commons, and what proved beyond controversy that they had seriously formed a plan for reducing their prince to subjection, was, that instead of granting this supply during the king's CHAP. life-time, as it had been enjoyed by all his im rediate predecessors, they voted it only for a year; and, after that should be elapsed, reserved to themselves the power of renewing or refusing the same concesfion c. But the house of peers, who saw that this duty was now become more necessary than ever to supply the growing necessities of the crown, and who did not approve of this encroaching spirit in the commons, rejected the bill; and the dissolution of that parliament followed to foon after, that no attempt feems to have been made for obtaining tonnage and poundage in any other form '.

[·] Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 399, 340. d 6 Hemy VIII. cap. 14.

CHARLES, meanwhile; continued still to levy this duty by his own authority; and the nation was for accustomed to that exertion of royal power, that no scruple was at first entertained of submitting to it. But the fucceeding parliament excited doubts in every one. The commons took there some steps towards declaring it illegal to levy tonnage and poundage without consent of parliament; and they openly showed their intention of employing this engine, in order to extort from the crown concessions of the most important nature. But Charles was not yet fufficiently tamed to compliance; and the abrupt dissolution of that parliament, as above related, put an end, for the time, to their farther pretentions.

THE following interval between the feeond and third parliament was distinguished by so many exertions of prerogative, that men had little leiture to attend to the affair of tonnage and poundage, where the abuse of power in the crown might seem to be of a more disputable nature. But after the commons, during the precedent fession, had remedied all these grievances by means of their petition of right, which they deemed so necessary; they afterwards proceeded to: take the matter into confider-

^{*} Journ. 5 July 1625. f See note [X] at the end of the volume.

LI. ly, of exacting, in return for the grant of this revenue, very large compliances on the grant of the crown. Their fudden prorogation preve ted them from bringing their pretentions to a fur conclusion.

WHEN Charles opened this baion, he had forefeen that the same controversy would arise; and he therefore took care, very early, among many mild and reconciling expressions, to inform the commons, "That he had not taken these duties as ap-" pertaining to his hereditary prerogative; but that it ever was, and still is, his meaning to enjoy "them as a gift of his people: And that, if he had 46 hitherto levied tonnage and poundage, he pretended to juilify himself only by the necessity of " fo doing, not by any right which he assumed "." This concession, which probably arose from the king's moderate temper, now freed from the impulse of Buckingham's violent counsels, might have fatisfied the commons, had they entertained no other view than that of ascertaining their own powers and privileges. But they carried their pretensions much higher. They insisted, as a necesfary preliminary, that the king should once entirely defist from levying these duties; after which, they were to take it into consideration, how far they would restore him to the possession of a revenue, of which he had clearly divested himself: But, befides that this extreme rigour had never been exercifed towards any of his predecessors, and many obvious inconveniencies must follow from the intermission of the customs; there were other reasons which deterred Charles from complying with fo hard a condition. It was probable that the commons might renew their former project of making this revenue only temporary, and thereby reducing their prince to perpetual dependence; they certainly would cut off the new impositions which Mary and

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 644. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 256. 346. Elizabeth,

Elizabeth, but especially James, had levied, and CIIAP. which formed no despicable part of the public revenue; and they openly declared, that they had at present many important pretensions, chiefly with regard to religion; and if compliance were resused, no supply must be expected from the commons.

In is easy to see in what an inextricable labyrinth Charles was now involved. By his own concessions, by the general principles of the English government, and by the form of every bill which had granted this duty, tonnage and poundage was derived entirely from the free gift of the people; and, consequently, might be withdrawn at their pleasure. If unreasonable in their refusal, they still refused nothing but what was their own. If public necessity required this supply, it might be thought also to require the king's compliance with those conditions which were the price of obtaining it. Though the motive for granting it had been the enabling of the king to guard the seas, it did not follow, that because he guarded the seas, he was therefore entitled to this revenue, without farther formality: Since the people had still reserved to themselves the right of judging how far that service merited such a supply. But Charles, notwithstanding his public declaration, was far from affenting to this conclusion in its full extent. The plain consequence, he saw, of all these rigours, and refinements, and inferences, was, that he, without any public necessity, and without any fault of his own, must, of a sudden, even from his accession, become a magistrate of a very different nature from any of his predecessors, and must fall into a total dependence on subjects over whom former kings, especially those immediately preceding, had exercised an authority almost unlimited. Entangled in a chain of consequences which he could not easily break, he was inclined to go higher, and rather deny the first principle, than admit of conclusions which to him appeared so absurd and unreasonable. II A P. LI.

CHAP. reasonable. Agreeably to the ideas hitherto entertained both by natives and foreigners, the monarch he esteemed the essence and soul of the English government; and whatever other power pretended to annihilate, or even abridge, the royal authority, must necessarily, he thought, either in its nature or exercife, be deemed no better than an usurpation. Willing to preferve the ancient harmony of the constitution, he had ever intended to comply, as far as he eafily could, with the ancient forms of administration: But when these forms appeared to him, by the inveterate obstinacy of the commons, to have no other tendency than to disturb that harmony, and to introduce a new conflitution; he concluded, that, in this violent fituation, what was subordinate must necessarily yield to what was pracipal, and the privileges of the people, for a time, give place to royal prerogative. From the rank of a monarch, to be degraded into a flave of his infolent, ungrateful subjects, seemed, of all indignities, the greatest; and nothing, in his judgment, could exceed the humiliation attending fuch a state, but the meanness of tamely submitting to it, without making some efforts to preserve the authority transmitted to him by his predecessors.

Though these were the king's restections and resolutions before the parliament assembled, he did not immediately break with them, upon their delay in voting him this supply. He thought that he could better justify any strong measure which he might afterwards be obliged to take, if he allowed them to carry to the utmost extremities their attacks upon his government and prerogative h. He contented himself, for the present, with soliciting the house by messages and speeches. But the commons, instead of hearkening to his solicitations, proceeded to carry their ferutiny into his management of religion', which was the only grievance to h Rushworth, volt i. p. 642.

Idem, ibid. p. 651. Whillocke, p. 12.

which, in their opinion, they had not as yet, by their CHAP.

petition of right, applied a fufficient remedy.

Ir was not possible that this century, so fertile in 1629. religious sects and disputes, could escape the contro- Arminianversy concerning fatalism and free-will, which, being strongly interwoven both with philosophy and theology, had, in all ages, thrown every school and every church into such inextricable doubt and perplexity. The first reformers in England, as in other European countries, had embraced the most rigid tenets of predestination and absolute decrees, and had composed, upon that system, all the articles of their religious creed. But these principles having met with opposition from Arminius and his fectaries, the controversy was foon brought into this island, and began here to diffuse itself. The Arminians, finding more encouragement from the superstitions spirit of the church than from the fanaticism of the puritans, gradually incorporated themfelves with the former; and fome of that fect, by the indulgence of James and Charles, had attained the highest preferments in the hierarchy. But their success with the public had not been altogether antwerable to that which they met with in the church and the court. Throughout the nation, they still lay under the reproach of innovation and herefy. The commons now levelled against them their formidable censures, and made them the objects of daily invective and declamation. Their protectors were stigmatised; their tenets canvassed; their views represented as dangerous and pernicious. To impartial spectators furely, if any such had been at that time in England, it must have given great entertainment, to fee a popular assembly, inslamed with faction and enthusiasin, pretend to discuss questions to which the greatest philosophers, in the tranquillity of retreat, had never hitherto been able to find any fatisfactory folution.

CHAP. LI. m.

Amidst that complication of disputes in which men were then involved, we may observe, that the appellation puritun stood for three parties, which, though commonly united, were yet actuated by very different views and motives. There were the political puritans, who maintained the highest principles of civil liberty; the puritans in discipline, who were averse to the ceremonies and episcopal government of the church; and the doctrinal puritans, who rigidly defended the speculative system of the first reformers. In opposition to all these, stood the court party, the hierarchy, and the Arminians; only with this diftinction, that the latter fect, being introduced a few years before, did not, as yet, comprehend all those who were favourable to the church and to monarchy. But, as the controversies on every subject grew daily warmer, men united themselves more intimately with their friends, and separated themselves wider from their antagonists; and the distinction gradually became quite uniform and regular.

Tims house of commons, which, like all the preceding during the reigns of James and Charles, and even of Elizabeth, was much governed by the puritanical party, thought that they could not better ferve their cause than by branding and punishing the Arminian sect, which, introducing an innovation in the church, were the least favoured and least powerful of all their antagonists. From this meafure it was easily foreseen, that, besides gratifying the animolity of the doctrinal puritans, both the puritans in discipline, and those in politics, would reap considerable advantages. Laud, Neile, Montague, and other bishops, who were the chief supporters of episcopal government, and the most zealous partisans of the discipline and ceremonies of the church, were all supposed to be tainted with The same men and their disciples Arminianism. were the strenuous preachers of passive obedience, and of entire submission to princes; and if these CHAP. could once be censured, and be expelled the church. and court, it was concluded, that the hierarchy would receive a mortal blow, the ceremonies be less rigidly insisted on, and the king, deprived of his most faithful friends, be obliged to abate those high claims of prerogative, on which at present he infilled.

Bur Charles, besides a view of the political consequences which must result from a compliance with fuch pretentions, was strongly determined, from principles of piety and conscience, to oppose them. Neither the dissipation incident to youth, nor the pleasures attending a high fortune, had been able to prevent this virtuous prince from embracing the most sincere sentiments of religion; and that character which, in that religious age, should have been of infinite advantage to him, proved in the end the chief cause of his ruin: Merely because the religion adopted by him was not of that precise mode and fect which began to prevail among his subjects. His piety, though remote from popery, had a tincture of superstition in it; and, being averse to the gloomy spirit of the puritans, was represented by them as tending towards the abominations of antichrist. Laud also had unfortunately acquired a great ascendant over him: And as all those prelates, obnoxious to the commons, were regarded as his chief friends and most favourite courtiers, he was resolved not to disarm and dishonour himself, by abandoning them to the resentment of his enemies. Being totally unprovided with military force, and finding a refractory independent spirit to prevail among the people; the most solid basis of his authority, he thought, consisted in the support which he received from the hierarchy.

In the debates of the commons, which are transmitted to us, it is easy to discern so early some sparks of that enthusiastic fire, which afterwards set the whole

Vol. VI.

· C H A P. whole nation in combustion. One Rouse made use of an allusion, which, though familiar, seems to have been borrowed from the writings of lord Bacon k. " If a man meet a dog alone," said he, the dog is fearful, though ever fo fierce by na-"ture: But if the dog have his master with him, " he will fet upon that man from whom he fled 66 before. This shews, that lower natures, being " backed by higher, increase in courage and strength; and certainly man, being backed with Omniopotency, is a kind of omnipotent creature. "things are possible to him that believes; and " where all things are possible, there is a kind of omnipotency. Wherefore, let it be the unanimous confent and resolution of us all to make a " vow and covenant henceforth to hold fast our God and our religion; and then shall we hence-"forth expect, with certainty, happiness in this " world !."

> OLIVER CROMWEL, at that time a young man of no account in the nation, is mentioned in these debates as complaining of one who, he was told, preached flat popery m. It is amusing to observe the first words of this fanatical hypocrite correspond so exactly to his character.

> THE inquiries and debates concerning tonnage and poundage went hand in hand with these theological or metaphyfical controversies. The officers of the custom-house were summoned before the commons, to give an account by what authority they had feized the goods of merchants who had refuled to pay these duties: The barons of the exchequer were questioned concerning their decrees on that head ". One of the sherists of London was committed to the Tower for his activity in support-

k Essay of Atheism.

¹ Rugiworth, vol. i. p. 646. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 250.

m Kushworth, vol. i.p. 655. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 289. * Rushworth, vol. 1. p. 654. Parl, Hift, vol. viii. p. 301.

Rolles, a merchant, and member of the house, being seized for his resulas to pay the duties, complaints were made of this violence, as if it were a breach of privilege. Charles supported his officers in all these measures; and the quarrel grew every day higher between him and the commons. Mention was made in the house of impeaching sir Richard Weston, the treasurer; and the king began to entertain thoughts of sinishing the session by a dissolution.

Sir John Elliot framed a remonstrance against levying tonnage and poundage without confent of parliament, and offered it to the clerk to read. It was refused. He read it himself. The question being then called for, the speaker, sir John Finch, said, That he had a command from the king to adjourn, and to put no question. Upon which he rose and left the chair. The whole house was in an uproar. The speaker was pushed back into the chair, and forcibly held in it by Hollis and Valentine; till a short remonstrance was framed, and was passed by acclamation rather than by vote. Papists and Arminians were there declared capital enemies to the commonwealth. Those who levied tonnage and poundage were branded with the same epithet. And even the merchants who should voluntarily pay these duties, were denominated betrayers of English liberty, and public enemies. The doors being locked, the gentleman usher of the house of lords, who was sent by the king, could not get admittance till

° Rushworth, vol. i. p. 653. P Ibid. p. 658. 9 Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 226.

The king's power of adjourning, as well as prorogoing the parliment, was and is never questioned. In the 19th of the late king, the judges determined that the adjournment by the king kept the parliament in state que until the next sitting; but that then no committees were to meet: But if the adjournment he by the house, then the committees and other matters do continue. Parl. Hist. vol. v. P. 466.

1629. of the parliament.

CHAP. this remonstrance was finished. By the king's order, he took the mace from the table, which ended their proceedings. And a few days after the parliament Diffolution was diffolved.

THE discontents of the nation ran high, on ac-March 10. count of this violent rupture between the king and parliament. These discontents Charles inslamed by his affectation of a severity which he had not power, nor probably inclination, to carry to extremities. Sir Miles Hobart, sir Peter Heyman, Selden, Coriton, Long, Strode, were committed to prison, on account of the last tumult in the house, which was called fedition '. With great difficulty, and after feveral delays, they were released; and the law was generally supposed to be wrested, in order to prolong their imprisonment. Sir John Elliot, Hollis, and Valentine, were summoned to their trial in the king's bench, for feditious speeches and behaviour in parliament; but refusing to answer before an inferior court for their conduct as members of a superior, they were condemned to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, to find sureties for their good behaviour, and to be fined the two former a thousand pounds a-piece, the latter five hundred". This fentence, procured by the influence of the crown, ferved only to show the king's disregard to the privileges of parliament, and to acquire an immense stock of popularity to the sufferers, who had so brayely, in opposition to arbitrary power, defended the liberties of their native country. The commons of England, though an immense body, and possessed of the greater part of national property, were naturally somewhat defenceles; because of their perfonal equality, and their want of leaders: But the king's severity, if these prosecutions deserve the name, here pointed out leaders to them whose resent- CHAP. ment was inflamed, and whose courage was nowise daunted by the hardships which they had undergone in so honourable a cause.

² Rushworth, vol. i. p. 660. Whitlocke, p. 12. t Rushworth, vol. i. p. 661. 681. Pan'. Hist. vol. viii. p. 354. May, p. 13. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 684. 691.

1629.

So much did these prisoners glory in their sufferings, that though they were promised liberty on that condition, they would not condescend even to present a petition to the king, expressing their forrow for having offended him *. They unanimously refused to find sureties for their good behaviour; and disdained to accept of deliverance on such easy Nav, Hollis was so industrious to continue his meritorious distress, that, when one offered to bail him, he would not yield to the rule of court, and be himself bound with his friend. Even Long, who had actually found furcties in the chief justice's chamber, declared in court, that his sureties should no longer continue. Yet because sir John Elliot happened to die while in custody, a great clamour was raised against the administration; and he was universally regarded as a martyr to the liberties of England -

Z Rushworth, vol. v. p. 440.

^{*} Whitlocke, p. 13. y Kennet, vol. iii. p. 49.

CHAP. LII.

Peace with France—Peace with Spain—State of the court and minifly—Character of the queen — Strefford — Laud — Innovations in the church—Irregular levies of money—Severities in the flar-chamber and high commission—Ship money—Trial of Hambden.

CHAP. LII. THERE now opens to us a new scene. Charles, naturally disgusted with parliaments, who, he found, were determined to proceed against him with unmitigated rigour, both in invading his prerogative, and refusing him all supply, resolved not to call any more, till he should see greater indications of a compliant disposition in the nation. Having lost his great favourite, Buckingham, he became his own minister; and never afterwards reposed in any one such unlimited considence. As he chiefly follows his own genius and disposition, his measures are henceforth less rash and hasty; though the general tenor of his administration still wants somewhat of being entirely legal, and perhaps more of being entirely prudent.

WE shall endeavour to exhibit a just idea of the events which followed for some years; so far as they regard foreign assairs, the state of the court, and the government of the nation. The incidents are neither numerous nor illustrious; but the knowledge of them is necessary for understanding the subsequent transactions, which are so memorable.

CHARLES, destitute of all supply, was necessarily reduced to embrace a measure, which ought to have been the result of reason and sound policy: He made peace with the two crowns against which he had hitherto waged a war, entered into without necessity, and conducted without glory. Notwithstanding the CHAP. distracted and helpless condition of England, no attempt was made either by France or Spain, to invade their enemy; nor did they entertain any farther project, than to defend themselves against the feeble and ill-concerted expeditions of that kingdom. Pleased that the jealousies and quarrels between king and parliament had difarmed fo formidable a power, they carefully avoided any enterprife which might roufe either the terror or anger of the English, and dispose them to domestic union and fubmillion. The endeavours to regain the good-will of the nation were carried so far by the king of Spain, that he generously released and sent home all the English prisoners taken in the expedition against Cadiz. The example was imitated by France, after the retroat of the English from the isle of Rhe. When princes were in such dispositions, and had so few pretensions on each other, it could not be difficult to conclude a peace. The Peace with treaty was first signed with France. The situation France and Spain. of the king's affairs did not entitle him to demand any conditions for the hugonots, and they were 14th April. abandoned to the will of their fovereign. Peace was afterwards concluded with Spain; where no 5th Nov. conditions were made in favour of the Palatine, except that Spain promised in general to use their good offices for his restoration ". The influence of these two wars on domestic assairs, and on the dispositions of king and people, was of the utmost consequence: But no alteration was made by them on the foreign interests of the kingdom.

Norming more happy can be imagined than the situation in which England then stood with regard to foreign affairs. Europe was divided between the rival families of Bourbon and Austria, whose opposite interests, and still more their mutual jealousies,

> E Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 23, 24. 9 Idem, ibid. p. 75. Whitlocke, p. 14.

secured

CHAP. secured the tranquillity of this island. Their forces were so nearly counterpoised, that no apprehensions were entertained of any event which could fuddenly disturb the balance of power between them. The Spanish monarch, deemed the most powerful, lay at greatest distance: And the English, by that means, possessed the advantage of being engaged by political motives into a more intimate union and confederacy with the heighbouring potentate. The dispersed fituation of the Spanish dominions rendered the naval power of England formidable to them, and kept that empire in continual dependence. France, more vigorous and more compact, was every day rifing in policy and discipline; and reached, at last, an equality of power with the house of Austria: But her progress, slow and gradual, left it still in the power of England, by a timely interpolition, to check her superiority. And thus Charles, could be have ayoided all diffensions with his own subjects, was in a fituation to make himself be courted and respected by every power in Europe; and, what has scarcely ever since been attained by the princes of this island, he could either be active with dignity, or neutral with security.

> A NEUTRALITY was embraced by the king; and during the rest of his reign, he seems to have little regarded foreign affairs, except so far as he was engaged by honour and by friendship for his sister and the Palatine, to endeavour the procuring of some relief for that unhappy family. He joined his good offices to those of France, and mediated a peace between the kings of Sweden and Poland, in hopes of engaging the former to embrace the protection of the oppressed protestants in the empire. This was the famed Gustavus, whose heroic genius, feconded by the wifest policy, made him in a little time the most distinguished monarch of the age, and rendered his country, formerly unknown and neglected, of great weight in the balance of Europe.

To encourage and assist him in his projected inva. CHAP. fion of Germany, Charles agreed to furnish him with fix thousand men; but, that he might preserve 1630. the appearance of neutrality, he made use of the marquis of Hamilton's name. That nobleman entered into an engagement with Gustavus; and inlisting these troops in England and Scotland at Charles's expence, he landed them in the Elbe. The decifive battle of Leipsic was fought soon after; where the conduct of Tilly and the valour of the Imperialists were overcome by the superior conduct of Gustavus and the superior valour of the Swedes. What remained of this hero's life was one continued series of victory, for which he was less beholden to fortune, than to those personal endowments which he derived from nature and from industry. That rapid progress of conquest, which we so much admire in ancient history, was here renewed in modern annals; and without that cause to which in former ages it had ever been owing. Military nations were not now engaged against an undisciplined and unwarlike people; nor heroes set in opposition to cowards. The veteran troops of Ferdinand, conducted by the most celebrated generals of the age, were foiled in every encounter, and all Germany was over-run in an instant by the victorious Swede. But by this extraordinary and unexpected success of his ally, Charles failed of the purpose for which he framed the alliance. Gustavus, elated by prosperity, began to form more extensive plans of ambition; and in freeing Germany from the yoke of Ferdinand, he intended to reduce it to subjection under his own. He resused to restore the Palatine to his principality, except on conditions which would have kept him in total dependence f. And thus the negotiation was protracted; till the battle of Lutzen, where the Swedish monarch pee Rushworth, vol. i. p. 46. 53. 62. 83. f Franklyn, vol. i. p. 415.

CHAP. rished in the midst of a complete victory which he obtained over his enemies.

1630.

We have carried on these transactions a sew years beyond the present period, that we might not be obliged to return to them; nor be henceforth interrupted in our account of Charles's court and kingdoms.

State of the court and ministry.

When we confider Charles as prefiding in his court, as affociating with his family, it is difficult to imagine a character at once more respectable and more amiable. A kind husband, an indulgent sather, a gentle master, a stedfast triend, to all these eulogics his conduct in private life fully entitled him. As a monarch too, in the exterior qualities, he excelled; in the effential, he was not defective. His address and manner, though perhaps inclining a little towards stateliness and formality, in the main corresponded to his high rank, and gave grace to that referve and gravity which were natural to him. The moderation and equity which shone forth in his temper, seemed to secure him against rash and dangerous enterprises: The good sense which he displayed in his discourse and conversation, seemed to warrant his fuccess in every reasonable undertaking. Other endowments likewife he had attained, which in a private gentleman would have been highly ornamental, and which in a great monarch might have proved extremely useful to his people. was possessed of an excellent taste in all the fine arts, and the love of painting was in some degree his favourite passion. Learned beyond what is common in princes, he was a good judge of writing in others, and enjoyed, himself, no mean talent in compofition. In any other age or nation, this monarch had been secure of a prosperous and a happy reign. But the high idea of his own authority which he had imbibed, made him incapable of giving way to the spirit of liberty, which began to prevail among his subjects. His politics were not supported by fuch fuch vigour and foresight as might enable him to CHAP. subdue their pretensions, and maintain his prerogative at the high pitch to which it had been raised by his predecessors. And above all, the spirit of enthufiasin being universally diffused, disappointed all the views of human prudence, and disturbed the operation of every motive which usually influences society.

Bur the misfortunes arising from these causes were yet remote. Charles now enjoyed, himself in the full exercise of his authority, in a social intercourse with his friends and courtiers, and in a moderate use of those pleasures which he most affected.

AFTER the death of Buckingham, who had some- Character what alienated Charles from the queen, she is to be of the confidered as his chief triend and favourite. That queen. ruflic contempt of the fair fex, which James affected and which, banishing them from his court, made it resemble more a fair or an exchange, than the feat of a great prince, was very wide of the difposition of this monarch. But though full of complaisance to the whole sex, Charles reserved all his passion for his consort, to whom he attached himfelf with unskaken fidelity and confidence. sense and spirit, as well as by her beauty, she justified the fondness of her husband; though it is allowed, that, being somewhat of a passionate temper, she precipitated him into hasty and imprudent measures. Her religion, likewise, to which she was much addicted, must be regarded as a great misfortune, fince it augmented the jealoufy which prevailed against the court, and engaged her to procure for the catholic's fome indulgences which were generally distasteful to the nation s.

In the former situation of the English government, when the fovereign was in a great measure independent of his subjects, the king chose his ministers either from personal favour, or from an 1630.

Strafford.

CHAP. opinion of their abilities, without any regard to their parliamentary interest or talents. It has since been the maxim of princes, wherever popular leaders encroach too much on royal authority, to confer offices on them; in expectation that they will afterwards become more careful not to diminish that power which has become their own. These politics were now embraced by Charles; a fure proof that a secret revolution had happened in the constitution, and had necessitated the prince to adopt new maxims of government h. But the views of the king were at this time so repugnant to those of the puritans, that the leaders, whom he gained, lost from that moment all interest with their party, and were even pursued as traitors with implacable hatred and refentment. This was the case with fir Thomas Wentworth, whom the king created first a baron, then a viscount, and afterwards earl of Strafford; made him president of the council of York, and deputy of Ireland; and regarded him as his chief minister and counsellor. By his eminent talents and abilities, Strafford merited all the confidence which his master reposed in him: His character was stately and austere; more sitted to procure esteem than love: His fidelity to the king was unshaken; but as he now employed all his counsels to support the prerogative, which he had formerly bent all his endeavours to diminish, his virtue seems not to have been entirely pure, but to have been sufceptible of strong impressions from private interest and ambition. Sir Dudley Digges was about the same time created master of the rolls: Noy, attorney-general: Littleton, solicitor-general. All these had likewise been parliamentary leaders; and were men eminent in their profession.

Laud.

In all ecclesiastical affairs, and even in many civil, Laud, bishop of London, had great influence

Sir Edw. Walker, p. 328.

Whitlocke, p. 13. May, p. 20.

over the king. This man was virtuous, if severity CHAP. of manners alone, and abstinence from pleasure, could deserve that name. He was learned, if polemical knowledge could entitle him to that praise. He was difinterested, but with unceasing industry he studied to exalt the priestly and prelatical character, which was his own. His zeal was unrelenting in the cause of religion; that is, in imposing, by rigorous measures, his own tenets and pious ceremonies on the obstinate puritans, who had profanely dared to oppose him. In prosecution of his holy purposes, he overlooked every human consideration; or, in other words, the heat and indifcretion of his temper made him neglect the views of prudence and rules of good manners. He was in this respect happy, that all his enemies were also imagined by him the declared enemies to loyalty and true piety, and that every exercise of his anger, by that means, became in his eyes a merit and a virtue. This was the man who acquired fo great an ascentiant over Charles, and who led him, by the facility of his temper, into a conduct which proved so fatal to himself and to his kingdoms.

THE humour of the nation ran at that time into Innovathe extreme opposite to superstition; and it was the church with difficulty that the ancient ceremonies to which men had been accustomed, and which had been fanctified by the practice of the first reformers, could be retained in divine fervice: Yet was this the time which Laud chose for the introduction of new ceremonies and observances. Besides that these were fure to displease as innovations, there lay, in the opinion of the public, another very forcible objection against them. Laud, and the other prelates who embraced his measures, were generally well instructed in sacred antiquity, and had adopted many of those religious sentiments which prevailed during the fourth and fifth centuries; when the Christian x630.

CHAP. Christian church, as is well known, was already sunk into those superstitions which were afterwards continued and augmented by the policy of Rome. The revival, therefore, of the ideas and practices of that age, could not fail of giving the English faith and liturgy some resemblance to the catholic superstition, which the kingdom in general, and the puritans in particular, held in the greatest horror and detestation. Men also were apt to think, that, without some secret purpose, such infignificant obfervances would not be imposed with such unrelenting zeal on the refractory nation; and that Laud's scheme was to lead back the English by gradual steps to the religion of their ancestors. They confidered not, that the very infignificancy of these ceremonies recommended them to the superstitions prelate, and made them appear the more peculiarly facred and religious, as they could serve to no other purpose. Nor was the resemblance to the Romish ritual any objection, but rather a merit, with Laud and his brethren; who bore a much greater kindness to the mother-church, as they called her, than to the sectaries and presbyterians, and frequently recommended her as a true christian church; an appellation which they refused, or at least scrupled to give to the others k. So openly were these tenets espoused, that not only the discontented puritans believed the church of England to be relapfing fast into Romish superstition: The court of Rome itself entertained hopes of regaining its authority in this island; and, in order to forward Laud's supposed good intentions, an offer was twice made him, in private, of a cardinal's hat, which he declined accepting 1. His answer was, as he says himself, That fomething dwelt within him, which would not suffer his compliance, till Rome were other than it is in.

el Rush. vol. ii. p. 190. Welwood, p. 61. k May, p. 25. m Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 1327. Whitlocke, p. 97.

A court lady, daughter of the earl of Devon. CHAP. shire, having turned catholic, was asked by Laud the reason of her conversion. 'Tis chiesly, said the, because I hate to travel in a crowd. The meaning of this expression being demanded, she replied, I perceive your grace and many others are making haste to Rome; and therefore, in order to prevent my being crowded, I have gone before you. It must be confessed, that though Laud deserved not the appellation of papilt, the genius of his religion was, though in a less degree, the same with that of the Romish: The same profound respect was exacted to the facerdotal character, the same submission required to the creeds and decrees of synods and councils, the same pomp and ceremony was affected in worship, and the same superstitious regard to days, postures, meats, and vestments. No wonder, therefore, that this prelate was, every where, among the puritans, regarded with horror, as the forerunner of antichrist.

As a specimen of the new ceremonies to which Land facrificed his own quiet and that of the nation, it may not be amiss to relate those which he was accused of employing in the consecration of St. Catherine's church, and which were the object of fuch general scandal and offence.

On the bishop's approach to the west door of the church, a loud voice cried, Open, open, ye everlasting doors, that the king of glory may enter in! Immediately the doors of the church flew open, and the bishop entered. Falling upon his knees, with eyes elevated and arms expanded, he uttered these words: This place is holy, the ground is holy: In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoft, I pronounce it holy.

Going towards the chancel, he several times took up from the floor some of the dust, and threw it in the air. When he approached, with his attendants,

tendants, near to the communion-table, he bowed frequently towards it: And on their return, they went round the church, repeating as they marched along, some of the psalms: And then said a form of prayer, which concluded with these words: We confectate this church, and separate it unto thee as holy ground, not to be profaned any more to common uses.

AFTER this, the bishop, standing near the communion-table, solemnly pronounced many imprecations upon such as should afterwards pollute that holy place by musters of soldiers, or keeping in it profane law-courts, or carrying burdens through it. On the conclusion of every curse, he bowed towards the east, and cried, Let all the people say, Amen.

The imprecations being all to piously finished, there were poured out a number of blessings upon such as had any hand in framing and building that sacred and beautiful edifice, and on such as had given, or should hereafter give to it, any chalices, plate, ornaments, or utensils. At every benediction, he in like manner bowed towards the east, and cried, Let all the people say, Amen.

THE scrmon followed; after which, the bishop consecrated and administered the sacrament in the following manner:

As he approached the communion-table, he made many lowly reverences: And coming up to that part of the table where the bread and wine lay, he bowed feven times. After the reading of many prayers, he approached the facramental elements, and gently lifted up the corner of the napkin in which the bread was placed. When he beheld the bread, he fuddenly let fall the napkin, flew back a step or two, bowed three feveral times towards the bread; then he drew nigh again, opened the napkin, and bowed as before.

NEXT, he laid his hand on the cup, which had a cover upon it, and was filled with wine. He let go the cup, fell back, and bowed thrice towards it. CHAP. He approached again; and lifting up the cover, LI peeped into the cup. Seeing the wine, he let fall the cover, started back, and bowed as before. Then he received the facrament, and gave it to others. And many prayers being said, the solemnity of the confecration ended. The walls and floor and roof of the fabric were then supposed to be sufficiently holv ".

ÓRDERS were given and rigorously insisted on, that the communion-table should be removed from the middle of the area, where it hitherto stood in all churches, except in cathedrals. It was placed at the cast end, railed in, and denominated an ALTAR; as the clergyman who officiated received commonly the appellation of PRIEST. It is not cafy to imagine the discontents excited by this innovation, and the fuspicions which it gave rise to.

THE kneeling at the altar, and the using of copes, a species of embroidered vestment, in administering the facrament, were also known to be great objects of scandal, as being popish practices: But the opposition rather increased than abated the zeal of the prelate for the introduction of these habits and ceremonies.

All kinds of ornament, especially pictures, were necessary for supporting that mechanical devotion, which was purposed to be raised in this model of religion: But as these had been so much employed by the church of Rome, and had given rife to fo much superstition, or what the puritans called idolatry; it was impossible to introduce them into English churches, without exciting general murmurs' and complaints. But Laud, possessed of present authority, persisted in his purpose, and made several attempts towards acquiring these ornaments. Some

n Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 76, 77. Welwood, p. 275. Franklyn. O Kushworth, vol. ii. p. 207. Whitlocke, p. 24. P. 386.

CHAP. of the pictures introduced by him were also found, upon inquiry, to be the very same that might be met with in the mass-book. The crucifix too, that eternal consolation of all pious catholics, and terror to all found protestants, was not forgotten on this occasion P.

IT was much remarked, that Sherfield, the recorder of Salisbury, was tried in the star-chamber, for having broken, contrary to the bishop of Salisbury's express injunctions, a painted window of St. Idmond's church in that city. He boasted, that he had destroyed these monuments of idolatry: But sor this effort of his zeal, he was fined 500 pounds, removed from his office, condemned to make a public acknowledgment, and be bound to his good behaviour 4.

Not only such of the clergy as neglected to obferve every ceremony were suspended and deprived by the high-commission court: Oaths were, by many of the bishops, imposed on the church-wardens; and they were fworin to inform against any one who acted contrary to the ecclesiastical canons i. Such a measure, though practised during the reign of Elizabeth, gave much offence; as relembling too nearly the practice of the Romith inquisition.

To shew the great alienation from the churches reformed after the presbyterian model, Laud advised, that the discipline and worship of the church should be imposed on the English regiments and tracking companies abroad. All foreigners of the Dutch and Walloon congregations were commanded to attend the established church; and indulgence was granted to none after the children of the first denizens'. Scudamore too, the king's ambaffador at Paris, had orders to withdraw himself from the

Rushworth, vol. ii. p.272. P. 451.

P Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 272, 273. 9 Ibid. p. 152. State Trials, vol. v. p. 46. Franklyn, p. 410, 411, 412. Rushworth, vol. ii. pe186. Ibid. p. 249. Franklyn, communion of the hugonots. Even men of sense CHAP. were apt to blame this conduct, not only because it gave offence in England, but because in foreign countries it lost the crown the advantage of being considered as the head and support of the reformation ".

1630.

On pretence of pacifying disputes, orders were issued from the council, forbidding, on both sides, all preaching and printing with regard to the controverted points of predestination and free-will. But i' was complained of, and probably with reason, that the impartiality was altogether confined to the orders, and that the execution of them was only meant against the Calvinists.

In return for Charles's indulgence towards the church, Laud and his followers took care to magnify, on every occasion; the regal authority, and to treat with the utmost disdain or detestation, all puritanical pretensions to a free and independent constitution. But while these prelates were so liberal in raising the crown at the expense of public liberty, they made no scruple of encroaching themselves on the royal rights the most incontestible; in order to exalt the hierarchy, and procure to their own order dominion and independence. All the doctrines which the Romish church had borrowed from some of the fathers, and which freed the spiritual from subordination to the civil power, were now adopted by the church of England, and interwoven with her political and religious tenets. A divine and apostolical charter was infifted on, preferably to a legal and parliamentary one ". The facerdotal character was magnified as facred and indefeizable: All right to spiritual authority, or even to private judgment in spiritual subjects, was refused to profane laymen: Ecclesiastical courts were held by the bishops in their own name, without any notice taken of the

[&]quot; State Papers collected by the earl of Clarendon, p. 333. Whitlocke, p. 22.

C H A P. king's authority: And Charles, though, extremely jealous of every claim in popular assemblies, seemed rather to encourage than repress those encroachments of his clergy. Having felt many sensible inconveniences from the independent spirit of parliaments, he attached himself entirely to those who professed a devoted obedience to his crown and person; nor did he foresee that the ecclesiastical power which he exalted, not admitting of any precise boundary, might in time become more dangerous to public peace, and no less fatal to royal prerogative, than the other.

So early as the coronation, Laud was the person, according to general opinion, that introduced a novelty, which, though overlooked by Charles, made a deep impression on many of the byestanders. After the usual ceremonies these words were recited to the king: "Stand and hold fast, from hence-" forth, the place to which you have been heir by " the succession of your forefathers, being now de-" livered to you by the authority of Almighty God, " and by the hands of us and all the bishops and " servants of God. And, as you see the clergy to come nearer the altar than others, fo remember "that, in all places convenient, you give them " greater honour; that the Mediator of God and " man may establish you on the kingly throne, to "be a mediator betwixt the clergy and the laity; " and that you may reign for ever with Jesus "Christ, the King of kings, and Lord of lords "."

'THE principles which exalted prerogative, were not entertained by the king merely as foft and agrecable to his royal ears: They were also put in practice during the time that he ruled without parliaments. Though frugal and regular in his expence, he wanted money for the support of government; and he levied it either by the revival of obsolete laws, or by violations, some more open, some more disguised, of the privileges of the nation. Though humane and CHAP. gentle in his temper, he gave way to a few severities in the star-chamber and high-commission, which feemed necessary, in order to support the present mode of administration, and repress the rising spirit of liberty throughout the kingdom. Under these two heads may be reduced all the remarkable transactions of this reign, during some years: For, in peaceable and prosperous times, where a neutrality in foreign assairs is observed, scarcely any thing is remarkable, but what is, in some degree, blamed or blame-And, lest the hope of relief or protection from parliament might encourage opposition, Charles issued a proclamation, in which he declared, "That " whereas, for feveral ill ends, the calling again of " a parliament is divulged; though his majesty has " shown, by frequent meetings with his people, " his love to the use of parliaments: Yet the late " abuse having, for the present, driven him un-" willingly out of that course; he will account it " presumption for any one to prescribe to him any "time for the calling of that affembly "." This was generally construed as a declaration, that, during this reign, no more parliaments were intended to be summoned z. And every measure of the king's confirmed a suspicion, so disagreeable to the generality of the people.

^{*} Franklyn, p. 114. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 201.

LII.

1630.

money.

TONNAGE and poundage continued to be levied by Irregular the royal authority alone. The former additional im- levies of positions were still exacted. Even new impositions were laid on several kinds of merchandise 2,

THE custom-house officers received orders from the council to enter into any house, warchouse, or cellar; to fearch any trunk or cheft; and to break any bulk whatever; in default of the payment of customs b.

⁷ Parl. Hift. vol. viii. p. 389. Rush. vol. ii. p. 3. 2 Rush. vol. ii. p. 8. May, don, vol. i. p. 4. May, p. 14. b Rush, vol. ii. p. 9. p. 16.

In order to exercise the militia, and to keep them in good order, each county, by an edict of the council, was assessed in a certain sum, for maintaining a muster-master, appointed for that service.

Compositions were openly made with reculants, and the popish religion became a regular part of the revenue. This was all the persecution which it underwent during the reign of Charles d.

A commission was granted for compounding with such as were possessed of crown-lands upon defective titles; and on this pretence, some money was exacted from the people '.

THERE was a law of Edward II., That whoever was possessed of twenty pounds a-year in land, should be obliged, when summoned, to appear and to receive the order of knighthood. Twenty pounds, at that time, partly by the change of denomination, partly by that in the value of money, were equivalent to 200 in the seventeenth century; and it seemed just, that the king should not strictly insist on the letter of the law, and oblige people of so small revenue to accept of that expensive honour. Edward VI. z, and queen Elizabeth h, who had both of them made use of this expedient for raising money, had summoned only those who were possessed of forty pounds a-year and upwards to receive knighthood, or compound for their neglect; and Charles imitated their example, in granting the same indulgence. Commissioners were appointed for fixing the rates of composition; and instructions were given to these commissioners, not to accept of a less sum than would have been due by the party, upon a tax of three subsidies and a half i. Nothing proves more plainly, how ill-disposed the people were to the Rush. vol. ii. p. 10.

Idem, ibid. p. 11, 12, 13. 247.

Idem, ibid. p. 49.

Statutum de militibus.

Rush. vol. ii.

P. 70, 71, 72. May, p. 16.

measures of the crown, than to observe, that they CHAP. loudly complained of an expedient, founded on positive statute, and warranted by such recent precedents. The law was pretended to be obsolete; though only one reign had intervened fince the last execution of it.

1630.

BARNARD, lecturer of St. Sepulchre's, London, Scretities used this expression in his prayer before sermon; of the star-Lord, open the eyes of the queen's majesty, that she may see Jesus Christ, whom she has pierced with her commitinfidelity, superstition, and idolatry. He was queftioned in the high-commission court, for this insult on the queen; but, upon his submission, dismissed k. Leighton, who had written libels against the king, the queen, the bishops, and the whole administration, was condemned by a very severe, if not a cruel, fentence; but the execution of it was suspended for . some time, in expectation of his submission!. All the severities, indeed, of this reign were exercised against those who triumphed in their sufferings, who courted perfecution, and braved authority: And, on that account, their punishment may be deemed the more just, but the less prudent. To have neglected them entirely, had it been consistent with order and public fafety, had been the wisest measure that could have been embraced; as perhaps it had been the most severe punishment that could have been inflicted on these zcalots.

chamber and high

In order to gratify the clergy with a magnificent fabric, subscriptions were set on foot, for repairing and rebuilding St. Paul's; and the king, by his countenance and example, encouraged this laudable undertaking m. By order of the privy-council, St. Gregory's church was removed, as an impediment to the project of extending and beautifying the cathedral. Some houses and shops likewise were 1631.

k Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 32. vol. iii. p. 60. Whitlocke, p. 15-

¹ Kennet's complete Hist. m ldem, p. 17.

LII. 1631

CHAP. pulled down; and compensation was made to the owners. As there was no immediate prospect of affembling a parliament, such acts of power in the king became necessary; and in no former age would the people have entertained any scruple with regard to them. It must be remarked, that the puritans were extremely averse to the raising of this ornament to the capital. It favoured, as they pretended, of popish superstition.

> A STAMP duty was imposed on cards: A new. tax, which, of itself, was liable to no objection; but appeared of dangerous consequence, when confidered as arbitrary and illegal °.

Monopolies were revived; an oppressive method of levying money, being unlimited, as well as destructive of industry. The last parliament of James, which abolished monopolies, had left an equitable exception in favour of new inventions; and on pretence of these, and of erecting new companies and corporations, was this grievance now renewed. The manufacture of foap was given to a company who paid a fum for their patent p. Leather, falt, and many other commodities, even down to linen rags, were put under restrictions.

IT is affirmed by Clarendon, that so little benefit was reaped from these projects, that of 200,000 pounds thereby levied on the people, scarcely 1500 came into the king's coffers. Though we ought not to suspect the noble historian of exaggerations to the disadvantage of Charles's measures; this fact, it must be owned, appears somewhat incredible. The fame author adds, that the king's intention was to teach his subjects how unthrifty a thing it was to refuse reasonable supplies to the crown. imprudent project! to offend a whole nation, under the view of punishment; and to hope, by acts of

n Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 88, 89, 90. 207. 462. 718. · Idein, ibid. p. 103. P Ruthworth, vol. ji. p. 136. 142. 189. 252.

being possessed of any force to prevent resistance.

The council of York had been first erected, after 1632.

THE council of York had been first erected, after a rebellion, by a patent from Henry VIII. without any authority of parliament; and this exercise of power, like many others, was indulged to that arbitrary monarch. This council had long acted chiefly as a criminal court; but, besides some innovations introduced by James, Charles thought pro-.per, some time after Wentworth was made president, to extend its powers, and to give it a large civil jurisdiction, and that in some respects discretionary. It is not improbable that the king's intention was only to prevent inconveniencies, which arose from the bringing of every cause, from the most distant parts of the kingdom, into Westminster-hall: But the confequence, in the mean time, of this measure, was the putting of all the northern counties out of the protection of ordinary law, and subjecting them to an authority somewhat arbitrary. Some irregular acts of that council were, this year, complained of .

The court of star-chamber extended its authority; and it was matter of complaint, that it encroached upon the jurisdiction of the other courts; imposing heavy fines and inflicting severe punishment, beyond the usual course of justice. Sir David Foulis was fined 5000 pounds, chiefly because he had dissuaded a friend from compounding with the commissioners of knighthood 3.

PRYNNE, a barrister of Lincoln's-Inn, had written an enormous quarto of a thousand pages, which he called Histrio-Mastyw. Its professed purpose was to decry stage-plays, comedies, interludes, music, dancing; but the author likewise took occasion to declaim against hunting, public festivals, Christmas-keeping,

1633.

Rushworth, vol ii. p. 158, 159, &c. Franklyn, p. 412.

^r Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 202, 203. ⁵ Ibid. vol. ii. p. 215, 216, &c.

CHAP. keeping, bonfires, and Maypoles. His zeal against all these levities, he says, was first moved by ob-1633. ferving, that plays fold better than the choicest fermons, and that they were frequently printed on finer paper than the Bible itself. Besides, that the players were often papifts, and desperately wicked; the play-houses, he affirms, are Satan's chapels, the play-haunters little better than incarnate devils; and fo many steps in a dance, so many paces to hell. The chief crime of Nero he represents to have been, his frequenting and acting of plays; and those, who nobly conspired his death, were principally moved to it, as he affirms, by their indignation at that enormity. The rest of his thousand pages is of a like strain. He had obtained a licence from archbishop Abbot's chaplain; yet was he indicted in the star-chamber as a libeller. It was thought somewhat hard, that general invectives against plays should be interpreted into fatires against the king and queen, merely because they frequented these amusements, and because the queen sometimes acted a part in pastorals and interludes, which were represented at court. The author, it must be owned, had, in plainer terms, blamed the hierarchy, the ceremonies, the innovations in religious worship, and the new superstitions, introduced by Laud'; and this, probahly, together with the obstinacy and petulance of his behaviour before the star-chamber, was the reafon why his sentence was so severe. He was condemned to be put from the bar; to stand on the pillory in two places, Westminster and Cheapside; to lose both his ears, one in each place; to pay 5000

pounds

^{*} The munc in the churches, he affirmed not to be the noise of men, but a bleating of brute beafts; choirifters bellow the tenor, as it were oxen; back a counterpart, as it were a kennel of dogs; 10ar out a treble, as it were a fort of bulls; and grunt out a base, as it were a number of hogs; Christmas, as it is kept, is the devil's Christmas; and Prynne employed a great number of pages to perfuade men to offect the name of Puritant as if Christ had been a Puritan; and so he faith in his Index. Rush. vol. ii. p. 223.

pounds fine to the king; and to be imprisoned CHAP.

during life".

This same Prynne was a great hero among the puritans; and it was chiefly with a view of mortifying that fect, that, though of an honourable profession, he was condemned by the star-chamber to so ignominious a punishment. The thorough-paced puritans were distinguishable by the sourness and austerity of their manners, and by their aversion to all pleasure and fociety w. To inspire them with better humour was certainly, both for their own fake and that of the public, a laudable intention in the court; but whether pillories, fines, and prisons, were proper expedients for that purpose, may admit of some question.

Another expedient which the king tried in order to infuse cheerfulness into the national devotion, was not much more successful. He renewed his father's edich for allowing sports and recreations on Sunday to luch as attended public worship; and he ordered his proclamation for that purpose to be publicly read by the clergy after divine service*. Those, who were puritanically affected refused obedience, and were punished by suspension or deprivation. The differences between the sects were before sufficiently great; nor was it necessary to widen them farther by these inventions.

Some encouragement and protection, which the king and the bishops gave to wakes, church-ales, bride-ales, and other cheerful festivals of the common people, were the objects of like scandal to the puritans y.

This year Charles made a journey to Scotland, June 12, attended by the court, in order to hold a parliament there, and to pass through the ceremony of his

u Rush. vol. ii. p. 220, 221, &c. W Dugdale, p. 2. * Rush. vol. ii. p. 193. 459. Whitlocke, p. 16, 17. Franklyn, y Rush. vol. ii. p. 191, 192. May, p. 2.

CHAP. coronation. The nobility and gentry of both kingdoms rivalled each other, in expressing all duty and respect to the king, and in showing mutual friendship and regard to each other. No one could have suspected, from exterior appearances, that such dreadful scenes were approaching.

ONE chief article of business (for it deserves the name) which the king transacted in this parliament, was, befittes obtaining fome fupply, to procure authority for ordering the habits of clergymen. The act did not pais without opposition and difficulty. The dreadful furplice was before men's eyes; and they apprehended, with some reason, that, under sanction of the law, it would soon be introduced among them. Though the king believed that his prerogative entitled him to a power, in general, of directing whatever belonged to the exterior government of the church, this was deemed a matter of

IMMEDIATELY after the king's return to England, he heard of archbishop Abbot's death: And, without delay, he conferred that dignity on his favourite, Laud; who, by this accession of authority, was now enabled to maintain ecclesiastical discipline with greater rigour, and to aggravate the general difcontent in the nation.

too great importance to be ordered without the

LAUD obtained the bishopric of London for his friend Juxon; and, about a year after the death of sir Richard Weston, created earl of Portland, had interest enough to engage the king to make that prelate high treasurer. Juxon was a person of great integrity, mildness, and humanity, and endued with a good understanding. Yet did this last promotion give general offence. His birth and character were deemed too obscure for a man raised fanction of a particular statute.

z Rush. vol. ii. p. 183.

^{*} Whitlocke, p. 423. Clarendon, vol. i. p. 99.

to one of the highest offices of the crown. And the CHAP. clergy, it was thought, were already too much elated by former instances of the king's attachment to them, and needed not this farther encouragement to assume dominion over the laity b. The puritans, likewise, were much dissatisfied with Juxon, notwithstanding his eminent virtues, because he was a lover of profane field-sports, and hunting.

Ship-money was now introduced. • The first 1634. writs of this kind had been directed to fea-port Ship-motowns only: But ship-money was at this time levied on the whole kingdom; and each county was rated at a particular fum, which was afterwards affested upon individuals. The amount of the whole tax was very moderate, little exceeding 200,000 pounds: It was levied upon the people with equality: The money was entirely expended on the navy, to the great honour and advantage of the kingdom: As England had no military force, while all the other powers of Europe were strongly armed, a sleet feemed absolutely necessary for her security: And it was obvious that a navy must be built and equipped at leifure, during peace; nor could it possibly be fitted out on a sudden emergence, when the danger became urgent: Yet all these considerations could not reconcile the people to the imposition. It was entirely arbitrary: By the same right any other tax might be imposed: And men thought a powerful fleet, though very defirable both for the credit and fafety of the kingdom, but an unequal recompence for their liberties, which, they apprehended, were thus facrificed to the obtaining of it.

England, it must be owned, was, in this respect, unhappy in its present situation, that the king had entertained a very different idea of the constitution, from that which began in general to prevail among his subjects. He did not regard national privileges

1633.

b Clarendon, vol. i. p. 97. May, p. 21. Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 257, 258, &c.

CHAP. privileges as so facred and inviolable, that nothing but the most extreme necessity could justify an in-fringement of them. He considered himself as the supreme magistrate, to whose care heaven, by his birth-right, had committed his people, whose duty it was to provide for their fecurity and happiness, and who was vested with ample discretionary powers for that falutary purpose. If the observance of ancient laws and customs was consistent with the prefent convenience of government, he thought himself obliged to comply with that rule; as the casiest, the fafest, and what procured the most prompt and willing obedience. But when a change of circumstances, especially if derived from the obstinacy of the people, required a new plan of administration, national privileges, he thought, must yield to supreme power; nor could any order of the state oppose any right to the will of the sovereign, directed to the good of the public. That these principles of government were derived from the uniform tenor of the English laws, it would be rash to affirm. The fluctuating nature of the constitution, the impatient humour of the people, and the variety of events had, no doubt, in different ages, produced exceptions and contradictions. These observations alone may be established on both sides, that the appearances were sufficiently strong in favour of the king to apologife for his following fuch maxims; and that public liberty must be so precarious under this exorbitant prerogative, as to render an opposition not only excusable, but laudable in the people .

Some laws had been enacted, during the reign of Henry VII. against depopulation, or the converting of arable lands into pasture. By a decree of the star-chamber, sir Anthony Roper was fined 4000 pounds for an offence of that nature. This severe d Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 535. 542.

Sec note [Y] at the end of the volume. f Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 270. Vol. iii. App. p. 206.

sentence was intended to terrify others into com- CHAP. position; and above 30,000 pounds were levied by LII. that expedient g. Like compositions, or, in default of them, heavy fines, were required for incroachments on the king's forests; whose bounds, by decrees deemed arbitrary, were extended much beyond what was usual h. The bounds of one forest, that of Rockingham, were increased from six miles to fixty'. The same refractory humour which made the people refuse to the king voluntary supplies, disposed them with better reason to murmur against. thefe irregular methods of taxation.

Morley was fined 10,000 pounds for reviling, challenging, and striking, in the court of Whitehall, fir George Theobald, one of the king's fervants k. This fine was thought exorbitant; but whether it was compounded, as was usual in fines imposed by the star-chamber, we are not informed.

ALLISON had reported, that the archbishop of York had incurred the king's displeasure, by asking a limited toleration for the catholics, and an allowance to build some churches for the exercise of their religion. For this slander against the archbishop, he was condemned in the star-chamber to be fined 1000 pounds, to be committed to prison, to be bound to his good behaviour during life, to be whipped, and to be fet in the pillory at Westminfler, and in three other towns in England. Robins, who had been an accomplice in the guilt, was condemned by a sentence equally severe?. Such events are rather to be confidered as rare and detached incidents, collected by the severe scrutiny of historians, than as proofs of the prevailing genius of the king's administration, which seems to have been more gentle and equitable than that of most of his

¹º Idem, vol. iii. p. 333. Franklyn, p. 478. h May, p. 16. ' Strafford's Letters and Ditpatches, vol. ii. p. 217.

Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 270.

C H A LII. or fix such instances of rigour during the course of fifteen years, which elapsed before the meeting of the long parliament. And it is also certain, that scandal against the great, though seldom prosecuted at present, is, however, in the eye of the law, a great crime, and subjects the offender to very heavy penalties. THERE are other instances of the high respect paid to the nobility and to the great in that age; when the powers of monarchy, though disputed; still maintained themselves in their pristine vigour. Clarendon m tells us a pleafant incident to this purpose: A waterman belonging to a man of quality, having a squabble with a citizen about his fare, showed his badge, the crest of his master, which happened to be a fwan; and thence infifted on better treatment from the cirizen. But the other replied carelessly, that he did not trouble his head about that goose. For this offence he was summoned before the marshal's court; was fined, as having opprobriously desamed the nobleman's crest, by calling the swan a goose; and was in effect reduced to beggary.

SIR Richard Granvile had thought himself illused by the earl of Sussolk in a law-suit; and he was accused before the star-chamber of having said of that nobleman, that he was a base lord. The evidence against him was somewhat lame; yet, for this slight offence, insufficiently proved, he was condemned to pay a fine of 8000 pounds; one half to the earl, the other to the king".

Sir George Markham, following a chase where lord Darcy's huntsman was exercising his hounds, kept closer to the dogs than was thought proper by the huntsman, who, besides other rudencs, gave

a Lord Landdown, p. 514.

m Life of Clarendon, vol. i. p. 72.

him foul language, which fir George returned with CHAP. a stroke of his whip. The fellow threatened to LII. complain to his master: The knight replied, If his 1634. maker should justify such insolence, he would serve him in the same manner, or words to that effect. Sir George was summoned before the star-chamber, and fined 10,000 pounds. So fine a thing was it in thise days to be a lord!——A natural reflection of lord Lanfdown's, in relating this incident of The people, in vindicating their liberties from the authority of the crown, threw oil also the yoke of the nobility. It is proper to remark, that this last incident happened early in the reign of James. The present practice of the star-chamber was far from being an innovation; though the present dispositions of the people made them repine more at this · fervitude.

CHARLES had imitated the example of Elizabeth and James, and had iffued proclamations forbidding the landed gentlemen and the nobility to live idly in London, and ordering them to retire to their country-feats. For disobedience to this edict, many were indicted by the attorney-general, and were fined in the star-chamber. This occasioned discontents; and the sentences were complained of, as illegal. But if proclamations had authority, of which nobody pretended to doubt, must they not be put in execution? In no instance, I must confess, does it more evidently appear, what contused and uncertain ideas were, during that age, entertained concerning the English constitution.

RAY, having exported fullers earth, contrary to the king's proclamation, was, besides the pillory,

Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 144. 9 Idem, ibid. p. 288.

Vol. VI. x condemned

1635.

Lord Lansdown, p. 515. This story is told differently in Hobart's Reports, p. 120. It there appears, that Markham was fined only 500 pounds, and very deservedly: For he gave the lie and wrote a challenge to lord D'Arcy. James was anxious to discourage the practice of duelling, which was then very prevalent.

CHAP. condemned in the star-chamber to a fine of 2000 pounds. Like fines were levied on Terry, Eman, and others, for disobeying a proclamation which forbad the exportation of gold. In order to count for the subsequent convulsions, even these incidents are not to be everlooked, as frivolous or contemptible. Such severities were afterwards magnified into the greatest enormities.

THERE remains a proclamation of this year, prohibiting hackney-coaches from standing in the street. We are told, that where were not above twenty coaches of that kind in London. There are, at present, near eight hundred.

A formidable fleet of fixty fail, the greatest that England had ever known, was equipped under the earl of Northumberland, who had orders to attack the herring-busses of the Dutch, which fished in what were called the British Seas. The Dutch were content to pay 30,000 pounds for a licence during this year. They openly denied, however, the claim of dominion in the seas beyond the friths, bays, and shores; and it may be questioned, whether the laws of nations warrant any farther pretensions.

This year the king sent a squadron against Sallee; and, with the assistance of the emperor of Morocco, destroyed that receptacle of pirates, by whom the English commerce, and even the English coasts, had long been insested.

Burton, a divine, and Bastwick, a physician, were tried in the star-chamber for seditious and schismatical libels, and were condemned to the same punishment that had been inslicted on Prynne. Prynne himself was tried for a new offence; and, together with another fine of 5000 pounds, was condemned CHAP to lose what remained of his ears. Besides that these writers had attacked with great severity, and even an intemperate zeal, the ceremonies, rites, and government of the church; the very answers which they gave in to the court were so full of contumacy and of invectives against the prelates, that no lawyer could be prevailed on to fign them ". The rigours, however, which they underwent, being so unworthy men of their profession, gave general offence; and the patience, or rather afacrity, with which they suffered, increased still farther the indignation of the public ".. The severity of the star-chamber, which was generally ascribed to Laud's passionate disposition, was, perhaps, in itself somewhat blameable; but will naturally, to us, appear enormous, who enjoy, in the utmost latitude, that liberty of the press, which is esteemed so necessary in every monarchy, confined by strict legal limitations. But as these limitations were not regularly fixed during the age of Charles, nor at any time before; so was this liberty totally unknown, and was generally deemed, as well as religious toleration, incompatible with all good government. No age or nation, among the moderns, had ever set an example of such an indulgence: And it seems unreasonable to judge of the measures embraced during one period, by the maxims which prevail in another.

1 ldem, ibid. p. 316.

Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 348. * Idem, ibid. p. 350.

Burton, in his book where he complained of innovations, mentioned among others, that a certain Wednesday had been appointed for a fast, and that the fast was ordered to be celebrated without any fermons. The intention, as he pretended, of that novelty was, by the example of a fast without sermons, to suppress all the Wednesday's lectures in London. It is observable, that the church of Rome

Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 381, 382, Sc. State Trials, vol. v. p. 66. "State Trials, vol. v. p. 80? * Ibid. p. 74. Franklyn, p. 839.

CHAP, and that of England, being both of them lovers of form and ceremony and order, are more friends to prayer than preaching; while the pufitanical fectaries, who find that the latter method of address, being directed to a numerous audience present and visible, is more inflaming and animating, have always regarded it as the chief part of divine service. Such circumstances, though minute, it may not be improper to transmit to posterity; that those, who are curious of tracing the history of the human mind, may remark how fai its several singularities coincide in different ages.

CERTAIN zealots had Irected themselves into a fociety for buying in of impropriations, and transferring them to the church; and great sums of money had been bequeathed to the fociety for these purpoles. But it was foon observed, that the only use which they made of their funds, was, to establish lecturers in all the confiderable churches; men who, without being subjected to episcopal authority, employed themselves entirely in preaching and spreading the fire of puritanism. Laud took care by a decree, which was passed in the court of exchequer, and which was much complained of, to abolish this fociety, and to stop their progress. It was, however, still observed, that throughout England the lecturers were all of them puritanically affected; and from them the clergymen, who contented themselves with reading prayers and homilies to the people, commonly received the reproachful appellation of dumb dogs.

THE puritans, restrained in England, shipped themselves off for America, and laid there the foundations of a government which possessed all the liberty, both civil and religious, of which they found But" themselves bereaved in their native country.

History y Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 150, 151. Whitlocke, p. 15. of the Life and Sufferings of Laud, p 211, 212.

their enemies, unwilling that they should any where CHAP. enjoy ease and contentment, and dreading, perhaps, the dangerous consequences of so disassected a colony, prevailed on the king to issue a proclamation, debarring these devotees access even into those inhospitable descrts x. Eight ships, lying in the Thames, and ready to fail, were detained by order of the council; and in these were embarked sir Arthur. Hazelrig, John Hambden, John Pym, and Oliver Cromwel, who had resolved for ever to abandon their native country, and fly to the other extremity of the globe; where they might enjoy lectures and discourses of any length or form which pleased them. The king had afterwards full-leifure to repent this exercise of his authority."

THE bishop of Norwich, by rigorously insisting on uniformity, had, banished many industrious tradefinen from that city, and chased them into Holland². The Dutch began to be more intent on commerce than on orthodoxy; and thought that the knowledge of useful arts and obedience to the laws formed a good citizen; though attended with errors in subjects where it is not allowable for human nature to expect any politive truth or certainty.

COMPLAINTS about this time were made, that the petition of right was, in some instances, violated, and that, upon a commitment by the king and council, bail or releasement had been refused to Jennings, Pargiter, and Danvers ^a.

WILLIAMS, bishop of Lincoln, a man of spirit and learning, a popular prelate, and who had been

² May, p. 82. * Rush. vol. ii. p. 414.

lord

^{*} Ruch, vol. ii. p. 409. 478. Y Mather's Hittory of New England, book i. Dugdale. Bates. Hutchinson's Hift, of Massachulet's Bay, vol. i. p. 42. This last quoted author puts the fact beyond controverly. And it is a curious fact, as well with regard to the characters of the men, as of the times. Can any one doubt, that the entuing quarrel was almost entuely theological; not political? What might be expected of the populace, when fuch was the charaster of the most ensightened leaders?

CHAP. lord keeper, was fined 10,000 pounds by the starchamber, committed to the Tower during the king's pleasure, and suspended from his office. This severe sentence was founded on frivolous pretences, and was more ascribed to Laud's vengeance, than to any guilt of the bishop b. Laud, however, had owed his first promotion to the good offices of that prelate with king James. But so implacable was the haughty primate, that he raised up a new prosecution against Williams, on the strangest pretence imaginable. In order to lety the fine above mentioned, some officers had been sent to seize all the furniture and books of his piscopal palace of Lincoln; and in runmaging the house, they sound in a corner some neglected letters, which had been thrown by as useless. These letters were written by one Osbaldistone, a schoolmaster, and were directed to Williams. Mention was there made of a little great man; and in another passage, the same person was denominated a little urchin. By inferences and constructions, these epithets were applied to Laud; and on no better foundation was Williams tried anew, as having received fcandalous letters, and not discovering that private correspondence. For this offence another fine of 8000 pounds was levied on him: Osbaldistone was likewise brought to trial, and condemned to pay a fine of 5000 pounds, and to have his cars nailed to the pillory before his own school. He saved himself by slight; and left a note in his study, wherein he said, "That he was gone 66 beyond Canterbury "."

THESE prosecutions of Williams seem to have been the most iniquitous measure pursued by the court during the time that the use of parliaments was suspended. Williams had been indebted for all his fortune to the favour of James; but having quarrelled, first with Buckingham, then with Laud, he threw himself into the country party; and with great CHAP. firmness and vigour opposed all the measures of the king. A creature of the court to become its obstinate enemy, a bishop to countenance puritans; these circumstances excited indignation, and engaged the ministers in those severe measures. Not to mention, what some writers relate, that, before the sentence was pronounced against him, Williams was offered a pardon upon his submission, which he refused to make. The court was apt to think, that so refractory a spirit must by any expedient be broken and subdued.

b Russworts, vol. ii. p. 416, &c.

^{&#}x27; Ibid. p. 803, &c. Whitiocke, p. 25.

In a former trial, which Williams underwent d, (for these were not the first,) there was mentioned, in court, a story, which, as it discovers the genius of parties, may be worth relating. Sir John Lambe urging him to profecute the puritans, the prelate asked, what fort of people these same puritans were? Sir John replied, "That to the world, they seemed to be fuch as would not fwear, whore, or be drunk; "but they would lie, cozen, and deceive: That they would frequently hear two fermons a-day, "and repeat them too, and that sometimes they would fast all day long." This character must be conceived to be fatirical; yet it may be allowed, that that fect was more averse to such irregularities as proceed from the excess of gaiety and pleasure, than to those enormities which are the most destructive of society. The former were opposite to the very genius and spirit of their religion; the latter were only a transgression of its precepts: And it was not difficult for a gloomy enthulialt to convince himself, that a strict observance of the one would atone for any violation of the other.

In 1632, the treasurer, Portland, had insisted with the vintuers, that they should submit to a tax of a penny a quart upon all the wine which they

⁴ Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 416.

CHAP. retailed. But they rejected the demand. In order to punish them, a decree, suddenly, without much inquiry or examination, passed in the star-chamber, prohibiting them to sell or dress victuals in their houses. Two years after, they were questioned for the breach of this decree; and in order to avoid punishment, they agreed to lend the king six thousand pounds. Being threatened, during the subsequent years, with sines and prosecutions, they at last compounded the matter and submitted to pay half of that duty which was at first demanded of them. It required little so esight to perceive that the king's right of issuing proclamations must, if profecuted, draw on a power of taxation.

LILBURKI was accused before the star-chamber of publishing and dispersing seditious pamphlets. He was ordered to be examined; but refused to take the oath usual in that court, that he would answer interrogatories, even though they might lead him to accuse himself. For this contempt, as it was interpreted, he was condemned to be whipped, pilloried, and imprifeneel. While he was whipped at the cart, and stord on the pillory, he harangued the populace, and declaimed violently against the tyranny of bishore. From his pockets also he scattered pamphlets, said to be seditious; because they attacked the hierarchy. The star-chamber, which was fitting at that very time, ordered him immediately to be gagged. He ceased not, however, though both gatged and pilloried, to stamp with his foot, and gesticulate, in order to show the people, that, if he had it in his power, he would still harangue them. This he wicur gave fresh provocation to the starchamber; and they condemned him to be imprisoned in a dungeon, and to be loaded with irons g. It was found difficult to break the spirits of men who placed. both their honour and their conscience in suffering.

Rishwath, vol. ii. p. 197.

f Idem, ibid. p. 451.

THE jealousy of the church appeared in another CHAP. instance less tragical. Archy, the king's fool, who, by his office, had the privilege of jesting on his 1637. master, and the whole court, happened unluckily to try his wit upon Laud; who was too facred a person to be played with. News having arrived from Scotland of the first commotions excited by the liturgy, Archy seeing the primate pass by, called to him, Who's fool, now, my lord? For this offence, Archy was ordered, by sentence of the council, to have his coat pulled over his head, and to be dif-missed the king's service h.

HERE is another instance of that rigorous subjection in which all med were held by Laud.. Some young gentlemen of Lincoln's-inn, heated by their cups, having drunk confusion to the archbishop, were at his instigation cited before the star-chamber. They applied to the earl of Dorset for protection. Who bears witness against you? said Dorset. One of the drawers, they faid. Where did he stand, when you were supposed to drink this health? subjoined the earl. He was at the door, they replied, going out of the room. Tush! cried he, the drawer was mistaken: You drank confusion, to the archbishop of Canterbury's enemies; and the fellow was gone before you pronounced the last word. This hint supplied the young gentlemen with a new method of defence: And being advised by Dorset to behave with great humility and great submission to the primate; the modesty of their carriage, the ingenuity of their apology, with the patronage of that noble lord, faved them from any severer punishment than a reproof and admonition, with which they were dismissed '.

This year, John Hambden acquired, by his spirit Trial of and courage, universal popularity throughout the Hambden. nation, and has merited great renown with posterity, for the bold stand which he made in defence of

h Rush. vol. ii. p. 470. Welwood, p. 278. 1 Rush. vol. iii. p. 180.

CIIAP. the laws and liberties of his country. After the imposing of ship-money, Charles, in order to discourage all opposition, had proposed this question £637. to the judges: "Whether, in a case of necessity, for the desence of the kingdom, he might not "impose this taxation; and whether he were not fole judge of the necessity?" These guardians of law and liberty replied with great complaifance, That in, a case of necessty he might impose that " taxation, and that he was fole judge of the necessity *:" Hambden had been rated at twenty shillings, for an estate which he possessed in the county of Buckingham: Yet notwithstanding this declared opinion of the judges, notwithstanding the great power, and sometimes rigorous maxims of the crown, notwithstanding the small prospect of relief from parliament; he resolved, rather than tamely fubmit to so illegal an imposition, to stand a legal profecution, and expose himself to all the indignation of the court. The case was argued during twelve days, in the exchequer-chamber, before all the judges of England; and the nation regarded, with the utinost anxiety, every circumstance of this celebrated trial. The event was easily forescen: But the principles, and reasonings, and behaviour of the parties engaged in the trial, were much canvassed and inquired into; and nothing could equal the favour paid to the one fide, except the hatred which attended the other.

In was urged by Hambden's counsel, and by his partisans in the nation, that the plea of necessity was in vain introduced into a trial of law; since it was the nature of necessity to abolish all law, and, by irresistible violence, to dissolve all the weaker and more artificial ties of human society. Not only the prince, in cases of extreme distress, is exempted from the ordinary rules of administration: All orders of men are then levelled; and any individual may confult the public fafety by any expedient which his CHAP. fituation enables him to employ. But to produce LII. so violent an effect, and so hazardous to every community, an ordinary danger or difficulty is not fufficient; much less, a necessity which is merely fictitious and pretended. Where the peril is urgent and extreme, it will be palpable to every member of the fociety; and though all ancient rules of government are in that case abrogated, men will readily, of themselves, submit to that irregular authority, which is exerted for their preservation. But what is there in dommon between such suppositions, and the present condition of the nation? England enjoys a profound reace with all her neighbours: And what is more, all her neighbours are engaged in furious and bloody wars among themselves, and by their mutual enmities farther ensure her tranquillity. The very writs themselves, which are issued for the levying of ship-money, contradict the supposition of necessity, and pretend only that the seas are infested with pirates; a slight and temporary inconvenience, which may well await a legal supply from parliament. The writs likewise allow several months for equipping the ships; which proves a very calm and deliberate species of necessity, and one that admits of delay much beyond the forty days requisite for fummoning that assembly. It is strange too, that an extreme necessity which is always apparent, and usually comes to a sudden crisis, should now have continued, without interruption, for near four years, and should have remained, during so long a time, invisible to the whole kingdom. And as to the pretention, that the king is sole judge of the necessity; what is this but to subject all the privileges of the nation to his arbitrary will and pleasure? To expect that the public will be convinced by fuch reasoning, must aggravate the general indignation; by adding, to violence against men's persons and their property, so cruel a mockery of their understanding.

[&]amp; Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 355. Whitlocke, p. 24.

1637.

CHAP. LII. 2637.

In vain are precedents of ancient writs produced: These writs, when examined, are only found to require the fea-ports, sometimes at their own charge, fometimes at the charge of the counties, to fend their ships for the defence of the nation. Even the prerogative, which empowered the crown to iffue fuch writs, is abolished, and its exercise almost entirely discontinued from the time of Edward III.'; and all the authority which remained, or was afterwards exercised, was to press ships into the public fervice, to be paid for by the public. How wide are these precedents from a power or obliging the peo-ple, at their own charge, to build new ships, to victual and pay them, for the public; nay, to furnish money to the crown for that perpose! What fecurity either against the farther extension of this claim, or against diverting to other purposes the public money, so levied? The plea of necessity would warrant any other taxation as well as that of ship-money: Wherever any difficulty shall occur, the administration, instead of endeavouring to elude or overcome it by gentle and prudent measures, will instantly represent it as a reason for infringing all ancient laws and institutions: And if fuch maxims and fuch practices prevail, what has become of national liberty? What authority is left to the great charter, to the statutes, and to that very petition of right, which, in the present reign, had been so solemnly enacted by the concurrence of the whole legislature?

THE defenceless condition of the kingdom while unprovided with a navy; the inability of the king, from his established revenues, with the utmost care and frugality, to equip and maintain one; the impossibility of obtaining, on reasonable terms, any voluntary supply from parliament: All these are reasons of state, not topics of law. If these reasons appear to the king so urgent as to dispense with the legal rules of government; let him enforce his CHAP. edicts by his court of star-chamber, the proper instrument of irregular and absolute power; not prostitute the character of his judges by a decree which is not, and cannot possibly be legal. By this means the boundaries at least, will be kept more distinct hetween ordinary law and extraordinary exertions of prerogative; and men will know that the national constitution is only suspended during a present and disficult emergence, by has not undergone a total and fundamental alteration.

" 1 State Trials, vol. v. p. 845, 255.

Notwithstanding these reasons, the prejudiced judges, four mexcepted, gave sentence in favour of the crown. Hambden, however, obtained by the trial the end for which he had so generously facrificed his fafety and his quiet: The people were roused from their leshargy, and became sensible of the danger to which their liberties were exposed. These national questions were canvassed in every company; and the more they were examined, the more evidently did it appear to many, that liberty was totally subverted, and an unusual and arbitrary authority exercised over the kingdom. Slavish principles, they faid, concur with illegal practices; ecclefiaftical tyranny gives aid to civil usurpation; iniquitous taxes are supported by arbitrary punishments; and all the privileges of the nation, transmitted through so many ages, secured by so many laws, and purchased by the blood of so many heroes and patriots, now lie prostrate at the feet of the mo-What though public peace and national industry increased the commerce and opulence of the kingdom? This advantage was temporary, and due alone, not to any encouragement given by the crown, but to the spirit of the English, the remains of their ancient freedom. What though the perm See State Trials: Article Ship-money, which contains the speeches of four judges in tayour of Hambden.

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

3637.

CHAP. fonal character of the king, amidst all his misguided counsels, might merit indulgence, or even praise? He was but one man; and the privileges of the people, the inheritance of millions, were too valuable to be facrificed to his prejudices and mistakes. Such, or more severe, were the sentiments promoted by a great party in the nation: No excuse on the king's part, or alleviation, I w reasonable soever, could be hearkened to or admitted: And to redrefs these grievances, a parliament was impatiently longed for; or any other incident, however calamitous, that might secure the people against those oppressions which they felt, or the greater ills which they apprehended from the combined encroachments of church and state.

In this situation, it may be imagined, the king CHAP. and the dake dreaded above all things the assemble. bling of a parliament: But so little foresight had they possessed in their enterprising schemes, that they found themseives under an absolute necessity of embracing that expedient. The money levied, or rather extorted, under colour of prerogative, had come in very flowly, and had left fuch ill-humour in the nation, that it appeared dangerous to renew the experiment. The absolute necessity of supply, it was hoped, would engage the commons to forget all past injuries; and, having experienced the ill effects of former obstinacy, they would probably assemble with a resolution of making some reasonable compliances. The inore to soften them, it was concerted, by fir Robert Cotton's advice', that Buckingham should be the first person that proposed in council the calling of a new parliament. Having laid in this stock of merit, he expected that Thirdpar. all his former misdemeanors would be overlooked liament. and forgiven; and that, instead of a tyrant and oppressor, he should be regarded as the first patriot in · the nation.

THE views of the popular leaders were much more judicious and profound. When the commons March 17. assembled, they appeared to be men of the same independent spirit with their predecessors, and possessed of fuch riches, that their property was computed to surpass three times that of the house of peers p; they were deputed by boroughs and counties, enflamed all of them by the late violations of liberty; many of the members themselves had been cast into prison, and had suffered by the measures of the court; yet, notwithstanding these circumstances, which might prompt them to embrace violent resolutions, they entered upon business with perfect

[•] Franklyn, p. 230.

P Sanderion, p. 106. Walker, p. 339.

CHAP. temper and decorum. They considered, that the king, difgusted at these popular assemblies, and little prepossessed in favour of their privileges, wanted z628. but a fair pretence for breaking with them, and would seize the first opportunity offered by any incident, or any undutiful behaviour of the members. He fairly told them in his first speech, that, " if "they should not do their duties, in contributing 46 to the necessities of the state, he must, in discharge of his conscience, use those other means which God had put into his hands, in order to fave that which the follies of some particular men may otherwise put in danger. Take not this for a "threatening," added the king, "for I fcorn to threaten any but my equals; but as an admonistion from him who, by nature and duty, has most care of your preservation and prosperity "." The lord keeper, by the king's direction, subjoined, "This way of parliamentary supplies, as his majesty so told you, he hath chosen, not as the only way, but as the fittest; not because he is destitute of others, but because it is most agreeable to the goodness of 44 his own most gracious disposition, and to the de-" " fire and weal of his people. If this be deferred, or necessity and the sword of the enemy make way for the others. Remember his majesty's admo-" nition; I say, remember it "." From these avowed maxims, the commons forefaw that, if the least handle were afforded, the king would immediately dissolve them, and would thenceforward deem himself justified for violating, in a manner still more open, all the ancient forms of the constitution. No remedy could then be looked for, but from insurrections and civil war, of which the issue would be extremely uncertain, and which must, in all events, prove calamitous to the nation. To correct the late disorders in the administration required some new laws which would, no doubt, appear harsh to a prince so enamoured of his prerogative; and it was requisite to temper, by the decency and moderation of their debates, the rigour which must necessarily attend their determinations. Nothing can give us a higher idea of the capacity of those men who now guided the commons, and of the great authority which they had acquired, than the forming and executing of so judicious and so difficult a plan of operations.

⁹ Rushworth, vol. i. p. 477. Franklyn. p. 233.

THE decency, however, which the popular leaders had prescribed to themselves, and recommended to others, hindered them not from making the loudest and most vigorous complaints against the grievances under which the nation had lately laboured. Sir Francis Seymour said, "This is the great council " of the kingdom, and here with certainty, if not " here only, his majesty may see as in a true glass, " the state of the kingdom. We are called hither " by his writs, in order to give him faithful coun-" fel, fuch as may stand with his honour: And "this we must do without flattery. We are also " sent hither by the people, in order to deliver their " just grievances: And this we must do without. " fear. Let us not act like Cambyses's judges, "who, when their approbation was demanded by " the prince to some illegal measure, said, that, "Though there was a written law, the Persian kings " might follow their own will and pleasure. This " was base flattery, sitter for our reproof than our " imitation; and as fear, so flattery, taketh away "the judgment. For my part, I shall shun both; "and speak my mind with as much duty as any man to his majesty, without neglecting the e public.

"But how can we express our affections, while "we retain our fears; or speak of giving, till we know whether we have any thing to give? For Vol. VI.

CHAP. " if his majesty may be persuaded to take what he will, what need we give?

3528.

"THAT this hath been done, appeareth by the billeting of foldiers, a thing nowife advantageous to the king's service, and a burden to the commonwealth: By the imprisonment of gentlemen for refusing the loan, who, if they had done the contrary for fear, had been as blameable as the projectors of that oppressive measure. To countenance these proceedings, hath it not been preached in the pulpit, or rather prated, that All we have is the king's by divine right? But when preachers for sake their own calling, and turn ignorant statesmen; we see how willing they are to exchange a good conscience for a bishopric.

"He, I must confess, is no good subject, who would not, willingly and cheerfully, lay down his life, when that facrifice may promote the interests of his sovereign, and the good of the commonwealth. But he is not a good subject, he is a slave, who will allow his goods to be taken from him against his will, and his liberty against the laws of the kingdom. By opposing these practices, we shall but tread in the steps of our forestathers, who still preferred the public before their private interest, nay, before their very lives. It will in us be a wrong done to ourselves, to our posterities, to our consciences, if we forego this claim and pretension."

"I READ of a custom," said sir Robert Philips, among the old Romans, that, once every year, they held a solemn festival in which their slaves had liberty, without exception, to speak what they pleased, in order to ease their asslicted minds, and, on the conclusion of the festival, the slaves severally returned to their former servitudes.

Franklyn, p. 243. Rufhworth, vol. i. p. 499.

Tills institution may, with some distinction, CHAP. well set forth our present state and condition.

1628.

"After the revolution of some time, and the grievous sufferance of many violent oppressions,

we have now, at last, as those slaves, obtained,

" for a day, some liberty of speech: But shall not, " I trust, be hereafter slaves: For we are born free.

"Yet, what new illegal burdens our estates and per-

" fons have groaned under, my heart yearns to think

" of, my tongue faulters to utter.

"I draw under two heads; acts of power against law, and the judgments of lawyers against our " liberty."

HAVING mentioned three illegal judgments passed within his memory; that by which the Scots, born after James's accession, were admitted to all the privileges of English subjects; that by which the new impositions had been warranted; and the late one, by which arbitrary imprisonments were authorised; he thus proceeded:

"I can live, though another, who has no right, be put to live along with me; nay, I can live,

"though burdened with impositions, beyond what at present I labour under: But to have my liberty,

"which is the soul of my life, ravished from me;

"to have my person pent up in a jail, without relief by law, and to be so adjudged,—O, improvident "ancestors! O, unwisc forefathers! to be so curious in providing for the quiet possession of our lands,

"and the liberties of parliament; and, at the same

"time, to neglect our personal liberty, and let us

"lie in prison, and that during pleasure, without redress or remedy! If this be law, why do we talk of liberties? Why trouble ourselves with disputes about a constitution, franchises, property of goods and the like? What may any man call his own, if not the liberty of his person?

R 2

CHAP LI.

1628.

"I AM weary of treading these ways; and there"fore conclude to have a select committee, in order
"to frame a petition to his majesty for redress of
"these grievances. And this petition being read, examined, and approved, may be delivered to the king; of whose gracious answer we have no cause

"to doubt, our desires being so reasonable, our intentions so loyal, and the manner so dutiful.

Neither need we fear, that this is the critical par" liament, as has been infinuated; or that this is

" the way to distraction: But assure ourselves of a

" happy issue. Then shall the king, as he calls us

" his great council, find us his true council, and own

" us his good council "."

The same topics were enforced by sir Thomas. Wentworth. After mentioning projectors and ill ministers of state, "These," said he, "have in-"troduced a privy-council, ravishing, at once, the spheres of all ancient government; destroying all liberty; imprisoning us without bail or bond. They have taken from us—What shall I say? Indeed, what have they left us? By tearing up the roots of all property, they have taken from us every means of supplying the king, and of in-

" gratiating ourselves by voluntary proofs of our

"duty and attachment towards him.

To the making whole all these breaches, I shall apply myself; and, to all these diseases, shall propound a remedy. By one and the same thing have the king and the people been hurt, and by the same must they be cured. We must vindicate: What? New things? No: Our ancient, legal, and vital liberties; by reinforcing the laws enacted by our ancestors; by setting such a stamp upon them, that no licentious spirit shall dare thenceforth to invade them. And shall we think

t Franklyn, p. 245. Parl. Hist. vol. vii. p. 363. Ruseworth, vol. i. p. 502.

this a way to break a parliament? No: Our de. CHAP. fires are modest and just. I speak both for the " interest of king and people. If we enjoy not

46 these rights, it will be impossible for us to relieve

"him. Let us never, therefore, doubt of a fa-

"." vourable reception from his goodness "."

These fentiments were unanimously embraced by the whole house. Even the court party pretended not to plead in defence of the late measures, any thing but the necessity to which the king had been reduced, by the obstinacy of the two former parlia-A vote, therefore, was passed without opposition against arbitrary imprisonments and forced loans w. And the spirit of liberty having obtained some contentment by this exertion, the reiterated messages of the king, who pressed for supply, were attended to with more temper. Five subsidies were voted him; with which, though much inferior to his wants, he declared himself well sätissied; and even tears of affection started in his eye, when he was informed of this concession. The duke's approbation too was mentioned by secretary Coke; but the conjunction of a subject with the sovereign was ill received by the house*. Though disgusted with the king, the jealousy which they felt for his honour was more sensible than that which his unbounded confidence in the duke would allow even himself to entertain.

THE supply, though voted, was not, as yet, passed into a law; and the commons resolved to employ the interval, in providing some barriers to their rights and liberties so lately violated. They knew that their own vote, declaring the illegality of the former measures, had not, of itself, sufficient authority to secure the constitution against future invasion.

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 526. Whitlocke, p. 9.

u Franklyn, p. 343. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 500.

[&]quot;Franklyn, p. 251. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 513. Whitlocke, p. 9.

right.

CHAP. Some act to that purpose must receive the fanction of the whole legislature; and they appointed a committee to prepare the model of fo important a law. By collecting into one effort all the dangerous and oppressive claims of his prerogative, Charles had exposed them to the hazard of one assault; and had farther, by presenting a nearer view of the consequences attending them, roused the independent genius of the commons. Forced loans, benevolences, taxes without consent of parliament, arbitrary imprisonments, the billeting of soldiers, martial law; these were the grievances complained of, and against these an eternal remedy was to be provided. The commons pretended not, as they affirmed, to any unusual powers or privileges: They aimed only at securing those which had been transmitted them from their ancestors: And their law Petition of they resolved to call a Petition of Right; as implying that it contained a corroboration or explanation of the ancient constitution, not any infringement of royal prerogative, or acquisition of new liberties.

WHILE the committee was employed in framing the petition of right, the favourers of each party, both in parliament and throughout the nation, were engaged in disputes about this bill, which, in all likelihood, was to form a memorable æra in the

English government.

THAT the statutes, said the partisans of the commons, which secure English liberty, are not become obsolete, appears hence, that the English have ever been free, and have ever been governed by law and a limited constitution. Privileges in particular, which are founded on the GREAT CHARTER, must always remain in force, because derived from a source of never-failing authority; regarded in all ages, as the most sacred contract between king and people. Such attention was paid to this charter by our generous ancestors, that they got the confirmation of it reiterated reiterated thirty several times; and even secured it CHAP. by a rule, which, though vulgarly received, seems in the execution impracticable. They have established it as a maxim, That even a statute, which should be enacted in contradiction to any article of that charter, cannot have force or validity. But with regard to that important article which secures personal liberty; so far from attempting, at any time, any legal infringement of it, they have corroborated it, by fix statutes, and put it out of all doubt and controversy. If in practice it has often been violated, abuses can never come in the place of rules; nor can any rights or legal powers be derived from injury and injustice. But the title of the subject to perfonal liberty not only is founded on ancient, and therefore the most sacred laws: It is consirmed by the whole Analogy of the government and constitution. A free monarchy in which every individual is a flave, is a glaring contradiction; and it is requisite, where the laws assign privileges to the different orders of the state, that it likewise secure the independence of the members. If any difference could be made in this particular, it were better to abandon even life or property to the arbitrary will of the prince; nor would such immediate danger ensue, from that concession, to the laws and to the privileges of the people. To bereave of his life a man not condemned by any legal trial, is fo egregious an exercise of tyranny, that it must at once shock the natural humanity of princes, and convey an alarm throughout the whole commonwealth. To confiscate a man's fortune, besides its being a most atrocious act of violence, exposes the monarch so much to the imputation of avarice and rapacity, that it will feldom be attempted in any civilized government. But confinement, though a less striking, is no less severe a punishment; nor is there any spirit so erect and independent, as not to be broken by the long continuance of the filent and inglorious fufferings R 4

¥628,

CHAP. sufferings of a jail. The power of imprisonment, therefore, being the most natural and potent engine of arbitrary government, it is absolutely necessary to remove it from a government which is free and legal. *

THE partifans of the court reasoned after a different manner. The true rule of government, said they, during any period, is that to which the people, from time immemorial, have been accustomed, and to which they naturally pay a prompt obedience. A practice which has ever struck their senses, and of which they have feen and heard innumerable precedents, has an authority with them much superior to that which attends maxims derived from antiquated statutes and mouldy records. In vain do the lawyers establish it as a principle, that a statute can never be abrogated by opposite custom; but requires to be expressly repealed by a contrary statute: While they pretend to inculcate an axiom peculiar to English jurisprudence, they violate the most established principles of human nature; and even, by necessary consequence, reason in contradiction to law itself, which they would reprefent as fo facred and inviola-A law, to have any authority, must be derived from a legislature, which has right. And whence do all legislatures derive their right but from long custom and established practice? If a statute contrary to public good, has, at any time, been rashly voted and assented to, either from the violence of faction, or the inexperience of senates and princes, it cannot be more effectually abrogated, than by a train of contrary precedents, which prove, that, by common consent, it has tacitly been set aside, as inconvenient and inspracticable. Such has been the case with all those statutes enacted during turbulent times, in order to limit royal prerogative, and cramp the fovereign in his protection of the public, and his execution of the laws. But above all branches of prerogative, that which is most necessary to be preserved, is the power of imprisonment.

ment. Faction and discontent, like diseases, fre. CHAP. quently ærise in every political body; and during these disorders, it is by the salutary exercise alone of this discretionary power, that rebellions and civil wars can be prevented. To circumscribe this power is to destroy its nature: Entirely to abrogate it, is impracticable; and the attempt itself must prove dangerous if not pernicious to the public. The supreme magistrate, in critical and turbulent times, will never, agreeably either to prudence or duty, allow the state to perish, while there remains a remedy, which, how irregular soever, it is still in his power to apply. And if, moved by a regard to public good, he employs any exercise of power condeinned by recent and express statute, how greedily, in such dangerous times, will factious leaders seize this pretence of throwing on his government the imputation of tyranny and despotism? Were the alternative quite necessary, it were surely much better for human society to be deprived of liberty than to be destitute of government.

IMPARTIAL reasoners will confess, that this subject is not, on both fides, without its difficulties. Where a general and rigid law is enacted against arbitrary * imprisonment, it would appear, that government cannot, in times of sedition and faction, be conducted but by temporary suspensions of the law; and such an expedient was never thought of during the age of Charles. The meetings of parliament were too precarious, and their determinations might be too dilatory, to serve in cases of urgent necessity. Nor was it then conceived, that the king did not possess of himself sufficient power for the security and protection of his people, or that the authority of these popular assemblies was ever to become so absolute, that the prince must always conform himself to it, and could never have any occasion to guard against their practices, as well as against those of his other subjects.

THOUGH

C H A P. LI.

Though the house of lords was not insensible to the reasons urged in favour of the pretensions of the commons, they deemed the arguments pleaded in favour of the crown still more cogent and convincing. That affembly feems, during this whole period, to have acted, in the main, a reasonable and a moderate part; and if their bias inclined a little too much, as is natural, to the side of monarchy, they were far from entertaining any design of facrificing to arbitrary will the liberties and privileges of the nation. Ashley, the king's serjeant, having afferted, in a pleading before the peers, that the king must sometimes govern by acts of state as well as by law; this position gave such offence, that he was immediately committed to prison, and was not released but upon his recantation and submission v. Being, however, afraid lest the commons should go too far in their projected petition, the peers proposed a plan of one more moderate, which they recommended to the consideration of the other house. It consisted merely in a general declaration, that the great charter, and the six statutes conceived to be explanations of it, stand still in force, to all intents and purposes; that, in consequence of the charter and the statutes, and by the tenor of the ancient customs and laws of the realm, every subject has a fundamental property in his goods, and a fundamental liberty of his person; that this property and liberty are as entire at present as during any former period of the English government; that in all common cases, the common law ought to be the standard of proceedings: in case, that, for the security of his majesty's " person, the general safety of his people, or the " peaceable government of the kingdom, the king " shall find just cause, for reasons of slate, to im-" prison or restrain any man's person; he was petitioned graciously to declare, that, within a convenient . time, he shall and will express the cause CHAP. of the commitment or restraint, either general or special, and upon a cause so expressed, will e leave the prisoner immediately to be tried ac" cording to the common law of the land 2."

ARCHBISHOP Abbot was employed by the lords to recommend, in a conference, this plan of a petition to the house of commons. The prelate, as was; no doubt, foreseen from his known principles, was not extremely urgent in his applications; and the lower house was fully convinced that the general declarations fignified nothing, and that the latter clause lest their liberties rather in a worse condition than before. They proceeded, therefore, with great zeal, in framing the model of a petition, which should contain expressions more precise, and more favourable to public freedom.

THE king could eafily see the consequence of these proceedings. Though he had offered, at the beginning of the fession, to give his consent to any law for the fecurity of the rights and liberties of the people; he had not expected that fuch inroads would be made on his prerogative. In order, therefore, to divert the commons from their intention, he sent a message, wherein he acknowledged past errors, and promised that, hereafter, there should be no just cause of complaint. And he added, "That the affairs of the kingdom press " him so, that he could not continue the session " above a week or two longer: And if the house be not ready, by that time, to do what is fit for " themselves, it shall be their own fault"." On a subsequent occasion, he asked them, "Why de-" mand explanations, if you doubt not the per-" formance of the statutes, according to their true " meaning? Explanations will hazard an encroach-

a State Trials, vol. vii. p. 193.

Z State Trials, vol. vii. p. 187. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 546.

i ELI. 2628.

CHAP. " ment upon the prerogative. And it may well " be faid, What need a new law to confirm an old, " if you repose considence in the declarations which "his majesty made to both houses "?" The truth is, the great charter and the old statutes were sufficiently clear in favour of personal liberty: But as all kings of England had ever, in cases of necessity or expediency, been accustomed, at intervals, to elude them; and as Charles, in a complication of instances, had lately violated them; the commons judged it requisite to enact a new law, which might not be eluded or violated, by any interpretation, construction, or contrary precedent. Nor was it fufficient, they thought, that the king promifed to return into the way of his predecessors. His predecessors, in all times, had enjoyed too much discretionary power; and by his recent abuse of it, the whole world had reason to see the necessity of entirely retrenching it.

THE king still persevered in his endeavours to clude the petition. He fent a letter to the house of lords, in which he went fo far as to make a particular declaration, "That neither he nor his privycouncil shall or will, at any time hereafter, com-" mit or command to prison, or otherwise re-" strain, any man for not lending money, or for " any other cause, which in his conscience he sthought not to concern the public good, and "the fafety of king and people." And he farther declared, "That he never would be guilty of fo base an action as to pretend any cause, " of whose truth he was not fully satisfied "." But this promise, though enforced to the commons by the commendation of the upper house, made no more impression than all the former mesfages,

b State Trials, vol. vii. p. 196. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 556. State Trials, vol. vii. p. 198. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 560. Park Hist, vol. viii. p. xxx.

Among the other evasions of the king, we may reckon the proposal of the house of peers, to subjoin, to the intended petition of right, the following clause: "We humbly present this petition to your majesty, not only with a care of preserving our own liberties, but with due regard to leave entire that fovereign power, with which your majesty is entrusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of your people "." Less penetration than was possessed by the leaders of the house of commons, could easily discover how captious this clause was, and how much it was calculated to elude the whole force of the petition.

THESE obstacles, therefore, being surmounted, the petition of right passed the commons and was fent to the upper house. The peers, who were probably well pleased in secret that all their solicitations had been eluded by the commons, quickly passed the petition without any material alteration; and nothing but the royal affent was wanting to give it the force of a law. The king accordingly came to the house of peers; sent for the commons; and, being feated in his chair of state, the petition was read to him. Great was now the aftonishmen's of all men, when, instead of the usual concise and clear form, by which a bill is either confirmed or rejected, Charles said, in answer to the petition, "The king willeth, that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm, and that " the statutes be put into execution; that his sub-" jects may have no cause to complain of any wrong or oppression, contrary to their just rights " and liberties, to the preservation whereof he holds "himself in conscience as much obliged as of his " own prerogative "."

State Trials, vol. vii. p. 199. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 561.
Pail. Hist. vol. viii. p. 126. Whitlocke, p. 10. Che note
[U] at the end of the volume.

State Trials, vol. vii. p. 212.
Rushworth, vol. i. p. 599.

CHAP. It is surprising that Charles, who had seen so many instances of the jealousy of the commons, who had himself so much roused that jealousy by his frequent evalive messages during this session, could imagine that they would rest satisfied with an answer so vague and undeterminate. It was evident, that the unufual form alone of the answer must excite their attention; that the disappointment must inflame their anger; and that therefore it was neceffary, as the petition feemed to bear hard on royal prerogative, to come early to some fixed resolution, either gracefully to comply with it, or courageously to reject it.

Ir happened as might have been foreseen. The commons returned in very ill humour. Usually, when in that disposition, their zeal for religion, and their enmity against the unfortunate catholics, ran extremely high. But they had already, in the beginning of the session, presented their petition of religion, and had received a satisfactory answer; though they expected that the execution of the laws against papists would, for the future, be no more exact and rigid, than they had hitherto found it. To give vent to their present indignation, they fell with their utmost force on Dr. Man-waring.

THERE is nothing which tends more to excuse, if not justify, the extreme rigour of the commons towards Charles, than his open encouragement and avowal of such general principles as were altogether incompatible with a limited government. Manwaring had preached a fermon, which the commons found, upon inquiry, to be printed by special command of the king ; and, when this fermon was looked into, it contained doctrines subverfive of all civil liberty. It taught, that though property was commonly lodged in the subject, yet,

LI.

1628.

whenever any exigency required supply, all pro- CHAP. perty was transferred to the sovereign; that the confent of parliament was not necessary for the imposition of taxes; and that the divine laws required compliance with every demand, how irregular foever, which the prince should make upon his subjects h. For these doctrines the commons impeached Manwaring. The fentence, pronounced upon him by the peers, was, that he should be imprisoned during the pleasure of the house, be fined a thousand pounds to the king, make submission and acknowledgment of his offence, be suspended during three years, be incapable of holding any ecclesiastical dignity or fecular office, and that his book be called in and burnt i.

IT may be worthy of notice, that no sooner was the session ended, than this man, so justly obnoxious to both houses, received a pardon, and was promoted to a living of considerable value k. Some years after, he was raised to the see of St. Asaph. If the republican spirit of the commons increased, beyond all reasonable bounds, the monarchical spirit of the court; this latter, carried to so high a pitch, tended still farther to augment the former. And thus extremes were every where affected, and the just medium was gradually deserted by all men.

From Manwaring, the house of commons, proceeded to censure the conduct of Buckingham, whose name hitherto they had cautiously forborn to mention. In vain did the king send them a mesfage, in which he told them, that the session was drawing near to a conclusion; and desired, that they would not enter upon new business, nor cast any aspersions on his government and ministry. Though the court endeavoured to explain

h Rushworth, vol. i. p. 585. 594. Parl. Hift. vol. viii. p. 168, 169, 170. &c. Welwood, p. 44. . Rushworth, vol. i. p. 65. Parl. Hift. vol. viii. p. 212. k Rushworth, vol. i. p. 635. Whitlocke, p. 11. 1 Rushworth, sol. i. p. 607. Vol. i. p. 605.

CHAP. and soften this message by a subsequent message"; as _ Charles was apt hastily to correct any hasty step -1628. which he had taken; it served rather to inslame than appeale the commons: As if the method of their proceedings had here been prescribed to them. It was foreseen, that a great tempest was ready to burst on the duke; and in order to divert it, the king thought proper, upon a joint application of the lords and commons, to endeavour giving them satisfaction with regard to the petition of right. He came therefore to the house of peers, and pronouncing the usual form of words, Let it be law as is defired, gave full fanction and authority to the petition. The acclamations with which the house resounded, and the universal joy diffused over the nation, shewed how much this petition had been the object of all men's vows and expectations.

> IT may be affirmed, without any exaggeration, that the king's assent to the petition of right produced such a change in the government, as was almost equivalent to a revolution; and by circumscribing, in so many articles, the royal prerogative, gave additional security to the liberties of the subject. Yet were the commons far from being satisfied with this important concession. Their ill-humour had been so much irritated by the king's frequet evasions and delays, that it could not be presently appealed by an affent, which he allowed to be so reluctantly extorted from him. Perhaps too, the popular leaders, implacable and artful, faw the opportunity favourable; and, turning against the king those very weapons with which he had furnished them, resolved to pursue the victory. The bill, however, for five subsidies, which had been formerly voted, immediately passed the house, because

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 610. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 197.

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 613. Journ. 7th June 1628. Parl. Hist.

vol. viii. p. 201.

P Rushworth, vol. i. p. 613.

cause the granting of that supply was, in a manner, tacitly contracted for, upon the royal assent to the petition; and had faith been here violated, no farther considence could have subsisted between king and parliament. Having made this concession, the commons continued to carry their scrutiny into every part of government. In some particulars their industry was laudable; in some it may be liable to censure.

A LITTLE after writs were issued for summoning this parliament, a commission had been granted to fir Thomas Coventry, lord keeper, the earl of Marlborough, treasurer, the earl of Manchester, president of the council, the earl of Worcester, privy-seal, the duke of Buckingham, high admiral, and all the confiderable officers of the crown; in the whole, thirty-three. By this commission, which, from the number of persons named in it, could be no fecret, the commissioners were empowered to meet and to concert among themselves the methods of levying money by impositions, or otherwise; Where form and circumstance, as expressed in the commission, must be dispensed with, rather than the substance be lest or hazarded. In other words, this was a scheme for finding expedients, which might raife the prerogative to the greatest height, and render parliaments entirely uleless. The commons applied for cancelling the commission 1; and were, no doubt, defirous that all the world should conclude the king's principles to be extremely arbitrary, and should observe what little regard he was disposed to pay to the liberties and privileges of his people.

A commission had likewise been granted, and some money remitted, in order to raise a thousand German horse, and transport them into England.

P Rush. vol. i. p. 614. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 214.

⁹ Journ. 13 June 1628.

CHAP. These were supposed to be levied, in order to support the projected impositions or excises; though the number seems insufficient for such a purpose'. The house took notice of this design in severe terms: And no measure, surely, could be projected' more generally odious to the whole nation. It mult, however, be confessed that the king was so far right, that he had now at last fallen on the only effectual method for supporting his prerogative. But at the same time he should have been sensible that, till provided with a fufficient military force, all his attempts, in opposition to the rising spirit of the nation, must, in the end, prove wholly fruitless; and that the higher he screwed up the springs of government, while he had so little real power to retain them in that forced fituation, with more fatal violence must they fly out, when any accident occurred to restore them to their natural action.

•The commons next refumed their censure of Buckingham's conduct and behaviour, against whom they were implacable. They agreed to present a remonstrance to the king, in which they recapitulated all national grievances and misfortunes, and omitted no circumstance which could render the whole administration despicable and odious. compositions with catholics, they said, amounted to no less than a toleration, hateful to God, full of difhonour and disprosit to his majesty, and of extreme scandal and gricf to his good people: They took notice of the violations of liberty above mentioned, against which the petition of right seems to have provided a sufficient remedy: They mentioned the decay of trade, the unfuccessful expeditions to Cadiz and the isle of Rhé, the encouragement given to Arminians, the commission for transporting German horse, that for levying illegal impositions; and all these grievances they ascribed solely to the ill-conduct of the duke of Buckingham. This CHAP. remonstrance was, perhaps, not the less provoking to Charles, because, joined to the extreme acri-, mony of the hibject, there were preserved in it, as in most of the remonstrances of that age, an affected civility and fubmission in the language. And as it was the first return which he met with for his late beneficial concessions, and for his facrifices of prerogative, the greatest by far ever made by an English fovereign, nothing could be more the object of just and natural indignation.

Ir was not without good grounds that the commons were to herce and affuming. Though they had already granted the king the supply of five subfidies, they still retained a pledge in their hands, which they thought enfured them fuccess in all their applications. Tonnage and poundage had not yet been granted by parliament; and the commons had artfully, this fession, concealed their intention of invading that branch of revenue, till the royal affent had been obtained to the petition of right, which they justly deemed of such importance. They, then openly afferted, that the levying of tonnage ton poundage without consent of parliament, was a pale pable violation of the ancient liberties of the people, and an open infringement of the petition of right, so lately granted. The king, in order to prevent the finishing and presenting of this remon- Proroga-Grance, came fuddenly to the parliament, and ended tion. this fession by a prorogation ".

Being freed for some time from the embarrassment of this assembly, Charles began to look towards foreign wars, where all his efforts were equally unfuccessful, as in his domestic government. The earl of Denbigh, brother-in-law to Buckingham,

· S 2

was 26th June.

^{&#}x27; Rush. vol. i. p. 619. Puil. Hist. vol, viii. p. 219, 220, &c.

Ruth. vol. i. p. 628. Journ. 18, 20 June 1628. " Journ, 26 June 1628.

CHAP. was dispatched to the relief of Rochelle, now closely besieged by land, and threatened with a blockade by fea: But he returned without effecting any thing; and having declined to attack the enemy's fleet, he brought on the English arms the imputation either of cowardice or ill-conduct. In order to repair this dishonour, the duke went to Portsmouth, where he had prepared a confiderable fleet and army, on which all the subsidies given by parliament had been expended. This supply had very much disappointed the king's expectations. The fame mutinous spirit which prevailed in the house of commons, had diffused itself over the nation; and the commissioners appointed for making the affeilments, had connived at all frauds which might diminish the supply, and reduce the crown to Ilill greater necessities. This national discontent, communicated to a desperate enthusiast, soon broke out in an event, which may be confidered as remarkable.

THERE was one Felton, of a good family, but of an ardent, melancholic temper, who had ferved under the duke in the station of lieutenant. His captain being killed in the retreat at the isle of Rhé, Felton had applied for the company; and when disappointed, he threw up his commission, and retired in discontent from the army. While private resentment was boiling in his sullen, unsociable mind, he heard the nation resound with complaints against the duke; and he met with the remonstrance of the commons, in which his enemy was reprefented as the cause of every national grievance, and as the great enemy of the public. Religious fanaticism farther inflamed these vindictive reslections; and he fancied that he flould do heaven acceptable fervice, if, at one blow, he dispatched this dangerous foe to religion and to his country ". Full of these dark views he secretly arrived at Portsmouth, at the same time with the duke, and watched for an opportunity CHAP.

May's Hist. of the Parliament, p. 10.

of effecting his bloody purpofe.

BUCKIN HAM had been engaged in conversation with Soubize and other French gentlemen; and a 23d Aug. difference of fer iment having arilen, the dispute, though conducted with temper and decency, had produced some of the evenent gesticulations and lively exertions of voice, in which that nation, more than the English, are ope to indulge themselves. The conversation being finished, the duke drew towards he door; and in that passage, turning himfelf to speak to sir Thomas Fryar, a colonel in the army, he was, on the fudden, over fir Thomas's shoulder, struck upon the breast with a knife. Without uttering other words than The villain has Death of killed me; in the same moment pulling out the Buckingknife, he breathed his last.

No man had seen the blow, nor the person who gave it; but in the confusion, every one made his own conjecture; and all agreed that the murder had been committed by the French gentlemen, whose angry tone of voice had been heard, while their words had not been understood by the bystanders. In the hurry of revenge, they had instantly been put to death, had they not been faved by fome of more temper and judgment, who, though they had the same opinion of their guilt, thought proper to referve them for a judicial trial and examination.

NEAR the door there was found a hat, in the inside of which was sewed a paper, containing four or five lines of that remonstrance of the commons, which declared Buckingham an enemy to the kingdom; and under these lines was a short ejaculation, or attempt towards a prayer. It was eafily concluded that this hat belonged to the affailin: But the difficulty still remained, Who that person should be? For the writing discovered not the name; and Whoever he was, it was natural to believe that he

CHAP. had already fled far enough not to be found without a hat.

1628.

In this hurry, a man without a hat was feen walking very composedly before the door. One crying out, Here is the fellow who killed the duke; every body ran to ask, Which is he? The man very sedately answered, I am he. The more furious immediately rushed upon him with drawn swords: Others, more deliberate, desended and protected him: He himself, with open arms, calmly and cheerfully exposed his breast to the swords of the most enraged; being willing to fall a sudden facrifice to their anger, rather than be reserved for that public justice which, he knew, must be executed upon him.

HE was now known to be that Felton who had ferved in the army. Being carried into a private room, it was thought proper so far to dissemble as to tell him, that Buckingham was only grievously wounded, but not without hopes of recovery. Felton smiled, and told them, that the duke, he knew, full well, had received a blow which had terminated all their hopes. When asked, at whose instigation he had performed that horrid deed? he replied, that they needed not to trouble themselves in that inquiry; that no man living had credit enough with him to have disposed him to such an action; that he had not even entrusted his purpose to any one; that the resolution proceeded only from himfelf, and the impulse of his own conscience; and that his motives would appear, if his hat were found: For that believing he should perish in the attempt, he had there taken care to explain them *.

When the king was informed of this assassination, he received the news in public with an unmoved and undisturbed countenance; and the courtiers, who CHAP. studied his looks, concluded, that fecretly he was not displeased to be rid of a minister so generally odious to the nation y. But Charles's command of himself proceeded entirely from the gravity and composure of his temper. He was still, as much as ever, attached to his favourite; and, during his whole life, he retained an affection for Buckingham's friends, and a prejudice against his enemies. He urged too, that Felton should be put to the question, in order to extort from him a discovery of his accomplices: But the judges declared, that though that practice had formerly been very usual, it was altogether illegal. So much more exact reasoners, with regard to law, had they become, from the jealous scruples of the house of commons.

^{*} Clasendon, vol. i. p. 27, 28.

MEANWHILE the distress of Rochelle had rifen to the utmost extremity. That vast genius of Richelieu, which made him form the greatest enterprises, led him to attempt their execution by means equally great and extraordinary. In order to deprive Rochelle of all fuccour, he had dared to project the throwing across the harbour a mole of a mile's extent in that boifterous ocean; and having executed his project, he now held the town closely blockaded on all fides. The inhabitants, though preffed with the greatest rigours of famine, still refused to submit; being supported, partly by the lectures of their zealous preachers, partly by the daily hopes of relief from England. After Buckingham's death, the command of the fleet and army was conferred on the earl of Lindesey; who, arriving before Rochelle, made fome attempts to break through the mole, and force his way into the harbour: But by the delays of the English, that work was now fully finished and fortified; and the Rochellers, finding 18th Oct.

CHAP, their last hopes to fail them, were reduced to surrender at discretion, even in fight of the English Of fifteen thousand persons shut up in the city, four thousand alone survived the fatigues and famine which they had undergone 2.

This was the first necessary step towards the prosperity of France. Foreign enemies, as well as domestic factions, being deprived of this resource, that kingdom began now to shine forth in its sull splen-By a steady prosecution of wife plans both of war and policy, it gradually gained an ascendant over the rival power of Spain; and every order of the state, and every sect, were reduced to pay submission to the lawful authority of the sovereign. The victory, however, over the hugonots, was at first pushed by the French king with great modera-A toleration was still continued to them; the only avowed and open toleration which, at that time, was granted in any European kingdom.

1629.

20th Jan. Newlession of parliament.

THE sailure of an enterprise, in which the English nation, from religious sympathy, so much interested themselves, could not but diminish the king's au-•thority in the parliament during the approaching fession: But the commons, when assembled, found many other causes of complaint. . Buckingham's conduct and character with some had afforded a reason, with others a pretence, for discontent against public measures: But after his death, there wanted not new reasons and new pretences for general distatisfaction. Manwaring's pardon and promotion were taken notice of: Sibthorpe and Cosins, two clergymen, who, for like reasons, were no less obnoxious to the commons, had met with like favour from the king: Montague, who had been censured for moderation towards the catholics, the greatest of crimes, had been created bishop of Chichester. They found, likewise, upon inquiry, that all the copies of the petition of right, which were dispersed, had, by the king's CHAP. orders, annexed to them the first answer, which had _____LI. given so little satisfaction to the commons. expedient by which Charles endeavoured to perfuade the people that he had nowife receded from his former claims and pretentions, particularly with regard to the levying of tonnage and poundage. Selden also complained in the house, that one Savage, contrary to the petition of right, had been punished with the loss of his ears, by a discretionary or arbitrary senter e of the star-chamber b. So apt were they, on their part, to stretch the petition into such conseque als as might deprive the crown of powers, which, from immemorial cultom, were supposed inherent in it.

² Rush. vol. i. p. 636,

But the great article on which the house of com- Tonnage mons broke with the king, and which finally created and in Charles a difgust to all parliaments, was their poundage. claim with regard to tonnage and poundage. this occasion, therefore, it is necessary to give an account of the controverly.

THE duty of tonnage and poundage, in more ancient times, had been commonly a temporary grant of parliament; but it had been conferred on Henry V. and all the fucceeding princes, during life, in order to enable them to maintain a naval. force for the defence of the kingdom. The necesfity of levying this duty had been so apparent, that each king had ever claimed it from the moment of his accession; and the first parliament of each reign had usually, by vote, conferred on the prince what they found him already in possession of. Agreeably to the inaccurate genius of the old constitution, this abuse, however considerable, had never been perceived nor remedied; though nothing could have been easier than for the parliament to have pre-

² State Trials, vol. vii. p. 216. Rush. wol. i. p. 643.

^{*} State Trials, vol. vn. p. 216. Part. Hitt. vol. vin. p. 246.

CHAP. vented it . By granting this duty to each prince, during his own life, and, for a year after his demise, to the successor, all inconveniencies had been obviated; and yet the duty had never for a moment been levied without proper authority. But contrivances of that nature were not thought of during those rude ages: And as so complicated and jealous a government as the English cannot subsist without many fuch refinements; it is easy to see how favourable every inaccuracy must formerly have proved to royal authority, which on all emergencies was obliged to supply, by discretionary power, the great deficiency of the laws.

THE parliament did not grant the duty of tonnage and poundage to Henry VIII. till the fixth of his reign: Yet this prince, who had not then railed his power to its greatest height, continued, during that whole time, to levy the imposition: The parliament, in their very grant, blame the merchants who had neglected to make payment to the crown; and though one expression of that bill thay seem ambiguous; they employ the plainest terms in calling tonnage and poundage the king's due, even before that duty was conferred on him by parlia-mentary authority. Four reigns, and above a whole century, had fince elapsed; and this revenue had still been levied before it was voted by parliament. So long had the inaccuracy continued, without being remarked or corrected.

During that fhort interval which passed between Charles's accession and his first parliament, he had followed the example of his predecessors; and no fault was found with his conduct in this particular. But what was most remarkable in the proceedings of that house of commons, and what proved beyond controversy that they had seriously formed a plan for reducing their prince to subjection, was, that instead of granting this supply during the king's CHAP. life-time, as it had been enjoyed by all his im rediate predecessors, they voted it only for a year; and, after that should be elapsed, reserved to themselves the power of renewing or refusing the same concesfion c. But the house of peers, who saw that this duty was now become more necessary than ever to supply the growing necessities of the crown, and who did not approve of this encroaching spirit in the commons, rejected the bill; and the dissolution of that parliament followed to foon after, that no attempt feems to have been made for obtaining tonnage and poundage in any other form '.

[·] Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 399, 340. d 6 Hemy VIII. cap. 14.

CHARLES, meanwhile; continued still to levy this duty by his own authority; and the nation was for accustomed to that exertion of royal power, that no scruple was at first entertained of submitting to it. But the fucceeding parliament excited doubts in every one. The commons took there some steps towards declaring it illegal to levy tonnage and poundage without consent of parliament; and they openly showed their intention of employing this engine, in order to extort from the crown concessions of the most important nature. But Charles was not yet fufficiently tamed to compliance; and the abrupt dissolution of that parliament, as above related, put an end, for the time, to their farther pretentions.

THE following interval between the feeond and third parliament was distinguished by so many exertions of prerogative, that men had little leiture to attend to the affair of tonnage and poundage, where the abuse of power in the crown might seem to be of a more disputable nature. But after the commons, during the precedent fession, had remedied all these grievances by means of their petition of right, which they deemed so necessary; they afterwards proceeded to: take the matter into confider-

^{*} Journ. 5 July 1625. f See note [X] at the end of the volume.

LI. ly, of exacting, in return for the grant of this revenue, very large compliances on the grant of the crown. Their fudden prorogation preve ted them from bringing their pretentions to a fur conclusion.

WHEN Charles opened this baion, he had forefeen that the same controversy would arise; and he therefore took care, very early, among many mild and reconciling expressions, to inform the commons, "That he had not taken these duties as ap-" pertaining to his hereditary prerogative; but that it ever was, and still is, his meaning to enjoy "them as a gift of his people: And that, if he had 46 hitherto levied tonnage and poundage, he pretended to juilify himself only by the necessity of " fo doing, not by any right which he assumed "." This concession, which probably arose from the king's moderate temper, now freed from the impulse of Buckingham's violent counsels, might have fatisfied the commons, had they entertained no other view than that of ascertaining their own powers and privileges. But they carried their pretensions much higher. They insisted, as a necesfary preliminary, that the king should once entirely defist from levying these duties; after which, they were to take it into consideration, how far they would restore him to the possession of a revenue, of which he had clearly divested himself: But, befides that this extreme rigour had never been exercifed towards any of his predecessors, and many obvious inconveniencies must follow from the intermission of the customs; there were other reasons which deterred Charles from complying with fo hard a condition. It was probable that the commons might renew their former project of making this revenue only temporary, and thereby reducing their prince to perpetual dependence; they certainly would cut off the new impositions which Mary and

Rushworth, vol. i. p. 644. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 256. 346. Elizabeth,

Elizabeth, but especially James, had levied, and CHAP. which formed no despicable part of the public revenue; and they openly declared, that they had at present many important pretensions, chiefly with regard to religion; and if compliance were refused, no supply must be expected from the commons.

In is easy to see in what an inextricable labyrinth Charles was now involved. By his own concessions, by the general principles of the English government, and by the form of every bill which had granted this duty, tonnage and poundage was derived entirely from the free gift of the people; and, consequently, might be withdrawn at their pleasure. If unreasonable in their refusal, they still refused nothing but what was their own. If public necessity required this supply, it might be thought also to require the king's compliance with those conditions which were the price of obtaining it. Though the motive for granting it had been the enabling of the king to guard the seas, it did not follow, that because he guarded the seas, he was therefore entitled to this revenue, without farther formality: Since the people had still reserved to themselves the right of judging how far that service merited such a supply. But Charles, notwithstanding his public declaration, was far from affenting to this conclusion in its full extent. The plain consequence, he saw, of all these rigours, and refinements, and inferences, was, that he, without any public necessity, and without any fault of his own, must, of a sudden, even from his accession, become a magistrate of a very different nature from any of his predecessors, and must fall into a total dependence on subjects over whom former kings, especially those immediately preceding, had exercised an authority almost unlimited. Entangled in a chain of consequences which he could not easily break, he was inclined to go higher, and rather deny the first principle, than admit of conclusions which to him appeared so absurd and unreasonable.

CHAP. reasonable. Agreeably to the ideas hitherto entertained both by natives and foreigners, the monarch he esteemed the essence and soul of the English government; and whatever other power pretended to annihilate, or even abridge, the royal authority, must necessarily, he thought, either in its nature or exercife, be deemed no better than an usurpation. Willing to preferve the ancient harmony of the constitution, he had ever intended to comply, as far as he eafily could, with the ancient forms of administration: But when these forms appeared to him, by the inveterate obstinacy of the commons, to have no other tendency than to disturb that harmony, and to introduce a new conflitution; he concluded, that, in this violent fituation, what was subordinate must necessarily yield to what was pracipal, and the privileges of the people, for a time, give place to royal prerogative. From the rank of a monarch, to be degraded into a flave of his infolent, ungrateful subjects, seemed, of all indignities, the greatest; and nothing, in his judgment, could exceed the humiliation attending fuch a state, but the meanness of tamely submitting to it, without making some efforts to preserve the authority transmitted to him by his predecessors.

Though these were the king's restections and resolutions before the parliament assembled, he did not immediately break with them, upon their delay in voting him this supply. He thought that he could better justify any strong measure which he might afterwards be obliged to take, if he allowed them to carry to the utmost extremities their attacks upon his government and prerogative h. He contented himself, for the present, with soliciting the house by messages and speeches. But the commons, instead of hearkening to his solicitations, proceeded to carry their ferutiny into his management of religion', which was the only grievance to

h Rushworth, volt i. p. 642.

Idem, ibid. p. 651. Whillocke, p. 12.

which, in their opinion, they had not as yet, by their CHAP.

petition of right, applied a fufficient remedy.

Ir was not possible that this century, so fertile in 1629. religious sects and disputes, could escape the contro- Arminianversy concerning fatalism and free-will, which, being strongly interwoven both with philosophy and theology, had, in all ages, thrown every school and every church into such inextricable doubt and perplexity. The first reformers in England, as in other European countries, had embraced the most rigid tenets of predestination and absolute decrees, and had composed, upon that system, all the articles of their religious creed. But these principles having met with opposition from Arminius and his fectaries, the controversy was foon brought into this island, and began here to diffuse itself. The Arminians, finding more encouragement from the superstitions spirit of the church than from the fanaticism of the puritans, gradually incorporated themfelves with the former; and fome of that fect, by the indulgence of James and Charles, had attained the highest preferments in the hierarchy. But their success with the public had not been altogether antwerable to that which they met with in the church and the court. Throughout the nation, they still lay under the reproach of innovation and herefy. The commons now levelled against them their formidable censures, and made them the objects of daily invective and declamation. Their protectors were stigmatised; their tenets canvassed; their views represented as dangerous and pernicious. To impartial spectators furely, if any such had been at that time in England, it must have given great entertainment, to fee a popular assembly, inslamed with faction and enthusiasin, pretend to discuss questions to which the greatest philosophers, in the tranquillity of retreat, had never hitherto been able to find any fatisfactory folution.

CHAP. LI. m.

Amidst that complication of disputes in which men were then involved, we may observe, that the appellation puritun stood for three parties, which, though commonly united, were yet actuated by very different views and motives. There were the political puritans, who maintained the highest principles of civil liberty; the puritans in discipline, who were averse to the ceremonies and episcopal government of the church; and the doctrinal puritans, who rigidly defended the speculative system of the first reformers. In opposition to all these, stood the court party, the hierarchy, and the Arminians; only with this diftinction, that the latter fect, being introduced a few years before, did not, as yet, comprehend all those who were favourable to the church and to monarchy. But, as the controversies on every subject grew daily warmer, men united themselves more intimately with their friends, and separated themselves wider from their antagonists; and the distinction gradually became quite uniform and regular.

Tims house of commons, which, like all the preceding during the reigns of James and Charles, and even of Elizabeth, was much governed by the puritanical party, thought that they could not better ferve their cause than by branding and punishing the Arminian sect, which, introducing an innovation in the church, were the least favoured and least powerful of all their antagonists. From this meafure it was easily foreseen, that, besides gratifying the animolity of the doctrinal puritans, both the puritans in discipline, and those in politics, would reap considerable advantages. Laud, Neile, Montague, and other bishops, who were the chief supporters of episcopal government, and the most zealous partisans of the discipline and ceremonies of the church, were all supposed to be tainted with The same men and their disciples Arminianism. were the strenuous preachers of passive obedience, and of entire submission to princes; and if these CHAP. could once be censured, and be expelled the church. and court, it was concluded, that the hierarchy would receive a mortal blow, the ceremonies be less rigidly insisted on, and the king, deprived of his most faithful friends, be obliged to abate those high claims of prerogative, on which at present he infilled.

Bur Charles, besides a view of the political consequences which must result from a compliance with fuch pretentions, was strongly determined, from principles of piety and conscience, to oppose them. Neither the dissipation incident to youth, nor the pleasures attending a high fortune, had been able to prevent this virtuous prince from embracing the most sincere sentiments of religion; and that character which, in that religious age, should have been of infinite advantage to him, proved in the end the chief cause of his ruin: Merely because the religion adopted by him was not of that precise mode and fect which began to prevail among his subjects. His piety, though remote from popery, had a tincture of superstition in it; and, being averse to the gloomy spirit of the puritans, was represented by them as tending towards the abominations of antichrist. Laud also had unfortunately acquired a great ascendant over him: And as all those prelates, obnoxious to the commons, were regarded as his chief friends and most favourite courtiers, he was resolved not to disarm and dishonour himself, by abandoning them to the resentment of his enemies. Being totally unprovided with military force, and finding a refractory independent spirit to prevail among the people; the most solid basis of his authority, he thought, consisted in the support which he received from the hierarchy.

In the debates of the commons, which are transmitted to us, it is easy to discern so early some sparks of that enthusiastic fire, which afterwards set the whole

Vol. VI.

· C H A P. whole nation in combustion. One Rouse made use of an allusion, which, though familiar, seems to have been borrowed from the writings of lord Bacon k. " If a man meet a dog alone," said he, the dog is fearful, though ever fo fierce by na-"ture: But if the dog have his master with him, " he will fet upon that man from whom he fled 66 before. This shews, that lower natures, being " backed by higher, increase in courage and strength; and certainly man, being backed with Omniopotency, is a kind of omnipotent creature. "things are possible to him that believes; and " where all things are possible, there is a kind of omnipotency. Wherefore, let it be the unanimous confent and resolution of us all to make a " vow and covenant henceforth to hold fast our God and our religion; and then shall we hence-"forth expect, with certainty, happiness in this " world !."

> OLIVER CROMWEL, at that time a young man of no account in the nation, is mentioned in these debates as complaining of one who, he was told, preached flat popery m. It is amusing to observe the first words of this fanatical hypocrite correspond so exactly to his character.

> THE inquiries and debates concerning tonnage and poundage went hand in hand with these theological or metaphyfical controversies. The officers of the custom-house were summoned before the commons, to give an account by what authority they had feized the goods of merchants who had refuled to pay these duties: The barons of the exchequer were questioned concerning their decrees on that head ". One of the sherists of London was committed to the Tower for his activity in support-

k Essay of Atheism.

¹ Rugiworth, vol. i. p. 646. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 250.

m Kushworth, vol. i.p. 655. Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 289. * Rushworth, vol. 1. p. 654. Parl, Hift, vol. viii. p. 301.

Rolles, a merchant, and member of the house, being seized for his resulas to pay the duties, complaints were made of this violence, as if it were a breach of privilege. Charles supported his officers in all these measures; and the quarrel grew every day higher between him and the commons. Mention was made in the house of impeaching sir Richard Weston, the treasurer; and the king began to entertain thoughts of sinishing the session by a dissolution.

Sir John Elliot framed a remonstrance against levying tonnage and poundage without confent of parliament, and offered it to the clerk to read. It was refused. He read it himself. The question being then called for, the speaker, sir John Finch, said, That he had a command from the king to adjourn, and to put no question. Upon which he rose and left the chair. The whole house was in an uproar. The speaker was pushed back into the chair, and forcibly held in it by Hollis and Valentine; till a short remonstrance was framed, and was passed by acclamation rather than by vote. Papists and Arminians were there declared capital enemies to the commonwealth. Those who levied tonnage and poundage were branded with the same epithet. And even the merchants who should voluntarily pay these duties, were denominated betrayers of English liberty, and public enemies. The doors being locked, the gentleman usher of the house of lords, who was sent by the king, could not get admittance till

° Rushworth, vol. i. p. 653. P Ibid. p. 658. 9 Parl. Hist. vol. viii. p. 226.

The king's power of adjourning, as well as prorogoing the parliment, was and is never questioned. In the 19th of the late king, the judges determined that the adjournment by the king kept the parliament in state que until the next sitting; but that then no committees were to meet: But if the adjournment he by the house, then the committees and other matters do continue. Parl. Hist. vol. v. P. 466.

1629. of the parliament.

CHAP. this remonstrance was finished. By the king's order, he took the mace from the table, which ended their proceedings. And a few days after the parliament Diffolution was diffolved.

THE discontents of the nation ran high, on ac-March 10. count of this violent rupture between the king and parliament. These discontents Charles inslamed by his affectation of a severity which he had not power, nor probably inclination, to carry to extremities. Sir Miles Hobart, sir Peter Heyman, Selden, Coriton, Long, Strode, were committed to prison, on account of the last tumult in the house, which was called fedition '. With great difficulty, and after feveral delays, they were released; and the law was generally supposed to be wrested, in order to prolong their imprisonment. Sir John Elliot, Hollis, and Valentine, were summoned to their trial in the king's bench, for feditious speeches and behaviour in parliament; but refusing to answer before an inferior court for their conduct as members of a superior, they were condemned to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, to find sureties for their good behaviour, and to be fined the two former a thousand pounds a-piece, the latter five hundred". This fentence, procured by the influence of the crown, ferved only to show the king's disregard to the privileges of parliament, and to acquire an immense stock of popularity to the sufferers, who had so brayely, in opposition to arbitrary power, defended the liberties of their native country. The commons of England, though an immense body, and possessed of the greater part of national property, were naturally somewhat defenceles; because of their perfonal equality, and their want of leaders: But the king's severity, if these prosecutions deserve the name, here pointed out leaders to them whose resent- CHAP. ment was inflamed, and whose courage was nowise daunted by the hardships which they had undergone in so honourable a cause.

² Rushworth, vol. i. p. 660. Whitlocke, p. 12. t Rushworth, vol. i. p. 661. 681. Pan'. Hist. vol. viii. p. 354. May, p. 13. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 684. 691.

1629.

So much did these prisoners glory in their sufferings, that though they were promised liberty on that condition, they would not condescend even to present a petition to the king, expressing their forrow for having offended him *. They unanimously refused to find sureties for their good behaviour; and disdained to accept of deliverance on such easy Nav, Hollis was so industrious to continue his meritorious distress, that, when one offered to bail him, he would not yield to the rule of court, and be himself bound with his friend. Even Long, who had actually found furcties in the chief justice's chamber, declared in court, that his sureties should no longer continue. Yet because sir John Elliot happened to die while in custody, a great clamour was raised against the administration; and he was universally regarded as a martyr to the liberties of England -

Z Rushworth, vol. v. p. 440.

^{*} Whitlocke, p. 13. y Kennet, vol. iii. p. 49.

CHAP. LII.

Peace with France—Peace with Spain—State of the court and minifly—Character of the queen — Strefford — Laud — Innovations in the church—Irregular levies of money—Severities in the flar-chamber and high commission—Ship money—Trial of Hambden.

CHAP. LII. THERE now opens to us a new scene. Charles, naturally disgusted with parliaments, who, he found, were determined to proceed against him with unmitigated rigour, both in invading his prerogative, and refusing him all supply, resolved not to call any more, till he should see greater indications of a compliant disposition in the nation. Having lost his great favourite, Buckingham, he became his own minister; and never afterwards reposed in any one such unlimited considence. As he chiefly follows his own genius and disposition, his measures are henceforth less rash and hasty; though the general tenor of his administration still wants somewhat of being entirely legal, and perhaps more of being entirely prudent.

WE shall endeavour to exhibit a just idea of the events which followed for some years; so far as they regard foreign assairs, the state of the court, and the government of the nation. The incidents are neither numerous nor illustrious; but the knowledge of them is necessary for understanding the subsequent transactions, which are so memorable.

CHARLES, destitute of all supply, was necessarily reduced to embrace a measure, which ought to have been the result of reason and sound policy: He made peace with the two crowns against which he had hitherto waged a war, entered into without necessity, and conducted without glory. Notwithstanding the CHAP. distracted and helpless condition of England, no attempt was made either by France or Spain, to invade their enemy; nor did they entertain any farther project, than to defend themselves against the feeble and ill-concerted expeditions of that kingdom. Pleased that the jealousies and quarrels between king and parliament had difarmed fo formidable a power, they carefully avoided any enterprife which might roufe either the terror or anger of the English, and dispose them to domestic union and fubmillion. The endeavours to regain the good-will of the nation were carried so far by the king of Spain, that he generously released and sent home all the English prisoners taken in the expedition against Cadiz. The example was imitated by France, after the retroat of the English from the isle of Rhe. When princes were in such dispositions, and had so few pretensions on each other, it could not be difficult to conclude a peace. The Peace with treaty was first signed with France. The situation France and Spain. of the king's affairs did not entitle him to demand any conditions for the hugonots, and they were 14th April. abandoned to the will of their fovereign. Peace was afterwards concluded with Spain; where no 5th Nov. conditions were made in favour of the Palatine, except that Spain promised in general to use their good offices for his restoration ". The influence of these two wars on domestic assairs, and on the dispositions of king and people, was of the utmost consequence: But no alteration was made by them on the foreign interests of the kingdom.

Norming more happy can be imagined than the situation in which England then stood with regard to foreign affairs. Europe was divided between the rival families of Bourbon and Austria, whose opposite interests, and still more their mutual jealousies,

> E Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 23, 24. 9 Idem, ibid. p. 75. Whitlocke, p. 14.

secured

CHAP. secured the tranquillity of this island. Their forces were so nearly counterpoised, that no apprehensions were entertained of any event which could fuddenly disturb the balance of power between them. The Spanish monarch, deemed the most powerful, lay at greatest distance: And the English, by that means, possessed the advantage of being engaged by political motives into a more intimate union and confederacy with the heighbouring potentate. The dispersed fituation of the Spanish dominions rendered the naval power of England formidable to them, and kept that empire in continual dependence. France, more vigorous and more compact, was every day rifing in policy and discipline; and reached, at last, an equality of power with the house of Austria: But her progress, slow and gradual, left it still in the power of England, by a timely interpolition, to check her superiority. And thus Charles, could be have ayoided all diffensions with his own subjects, was in a fituation to make himself be courted and respected by every power in Europe; and, what has scarcely ever since been attained by the princes of this island, he could either be active with dignity, or neutral with security.

> A NEUTRALITY was embraced by the king; and during the rest of his reign, he seems to have little regarded foreign affairs, except so far as he was engaged by honour and by friendship for his sister and the Palatine, to endeavour the procuring of some relief for that unhappy family. He joined his good offices to those of France, and mediated a peace between the kings of Sweden and Poland, in hopes of engaging the former to embrace the protection of the oppressed protestants in the empire. This was the famed Gustavus, whose heroic genius, feconded by the wifest policy, made him in a little time the most distinguished monarch of the age, and rendered his country, formerly unknown and neglected, of great weight in the balance of Europe.

To encourage and assist him in his projected inva. CHAP. fion of Germany, Charles agreed to furnish him with fix thousand men; but, that he might preserve 1630. the appearance of neutrality, he made use of the marquis of Hamilton's name. That nobleman entered into an engagement with Gustavus; and inlisting these troops in England and Scotland at Charles's expence, he landed them in the Elbe. The decifive battle of Leipsic was fought soon after; where the conduct of Tilly and the valour of the Imperialists were overcome by the superior conduct of Gustavus and the superior valour of the Swedes. What remained of this hero's life was one continued series of victory, for which he was less beholden to fortune, than to those personal endowments which he derived from nature and from industry. That rapid progress of conquest, which we so much admire in ancient history, was here renewed in modern annals; and without that cause to which in former ages it had ever been owing. Military nations were not now engaged against an undisciplined and unwarlike people; nor heroes set in opposition to cowards. The veteran troops of Ferdinand, conducted by the most celebrated generals of the age, were foiled in every encounter, and all Germany was over-run in an instant by the victorious Swede. But by this extraordinary and unexpected success of his ally, Charles failed of the purpose for which he framed the alliance. Gustavus, elated by prosperity, began to form more extensive plans of ambition; and in freeing Germany from the yoke of Ferdinand, he intended to reduce it to subjection under his own. He resused to restore the Palatine to his principality, except on conditions which would have kept him in total dependence f. And thus the negotiation was protracted; till the battle of Lutzen, where the Swedish monarch pe-

E Rushworth, vol. i. p. 46. 53. 62. 83. f Franklyn, vol. i. p. 415.

CHAP. rished in the midst of a complete victory which he obtained over his enemies.

1630.

We have carried on these transactions a sew years beyond the present period, that we might not be obliged to return to them; nor be henceforth interrupted in our account of Charles's court and kingdoms.

State of the court and ministry.

When we confider Charles as prefiding in his court, as affociating with his family, it is difficult to imagine a character at once more respectable and more amiable. A kind husband, an indulgent sather, a gentle master, a stedfast triend, to all these eulogics his conduct in private life fully entitled him. As a monarch too, in the exterior qualities, he excelled; in the effential, he was not defective. His address and manner, though perhaps inclining a little towards stateliness and formality, in the main corresponded to his high rank, and gave grace to that referve and gravity which were natural to him. The moderation and equity which shone forth in his temper, seemed to secure him against rash and dangerous enterprises: The good sense which he displayed in his discourse and conversation, seemed to warrant his fuccess in every reasonable undertaking. Other endowments likewife he had attained, which in a private gentleman would have been highly ornamental, and which in a great monarch might have proved extremely useful to his people. was possessed of an excellent taste in all the fine arts, and the love of painting was in some degree his favourite passion. Learned beyond what is common in princes, he was a good judge of writing in others, and enjoyed, himself, no mean talent in compofition. In any other age or nation, this monarch had been secure of a prosperous and a happy reign. But the high idea of his own authority which he had imbibed, made him incapable of giving way to the spirit of liberty, which began to prevail among his subjects. His politics were not supported by fuch fuch vigour and foresight as might enable him to CHAP. subdue their pretensions, and maintain his prerogative at the high pitch to which it had been raised by his predecessors. And above all, the spirit of enthufiafin being univerfally diffused, disappointed all the views of human prudence, and disturbed the operation of every motive which usually influences society.

Bur the misfortunes arising from these causes were yet remote. Charles now enjoyed, himself in the full exercise of his authority, in a social intercourse with his friends and courtiers, and in a moderate use of those pleasures which he most affected.

AFTER the death of Buckingham, who had some- Character what alienated Charles from the queen, she is to be of the confidered as his chief triend and favourite. That queen. ruflic contempt of the fair fex, which James affected and which, banishing them from his court, made it resemble more a fair or an exchange, than the feat of a great prince, was very wide of the difposition of this monarch. But though full of complaisance to the whole sex, Charles reserved all his passion for his consort, to whom he attached himfelf with unskaken fidelity and confidence. sense and spirit, as well as by her beauty, she justified the fondness of her husband; though it is allowed, that, being somewhat of a passionate temper, she precipitated him into hasty and imprudent measures. Her religion, likewise, to which she was much addicted, must be regarded as a great misfortune, fince it augmented the jealoufy which prevailed against the court, and engaged her to procure for the catholic's fome indulgences which were generally distasteful to the nation s.

In the former situation of the English government, when the fovereign was in a great measure independent of his subjects, the king chose his ministers either from personal favour, or from an 1630.

Strafford.

CHAP. opinion of their abilities, without any regard to their parliamentary interest or talents. It has since been the maxim of princes, wherever popular leaders encroach too much on royal authority, to confer offices on them; in expectation that they will afterwards become more careful not to diminish that power which has become their own. These politics were now embraced by Charles; a fure proof that a secret revolution had happened in the constitution, and had necessitated the prince to adopt new maxims of government h. But the views of the king were at this time so repugnant to those of the puritans, that the leaders, whom he gained, lost from that moment all interest with their party, and were even pursued as traitors with implacable hatred and refentment. This was the case with fir Thomas Wentworth, whom the king created first a baron, then a viscount, and afterwards earl of Strafford; made him president of the council of York, and deputy of Ireland; and regarded him as his chief minister and counsellor. By his eminent talents and abilities, Strafford merited all the confidence which his master reposed in him: His character was stately and austere; more sitted to procure esteem than love: His fidelity to the king was unshaken; but as he now employed all his counsels to support the prerogative, which he had formerly bent all his endeavours to diminish, his virtue seems not to have been entirely pure, but to have been sufceptible of strong impressions from private interest and ambition. Sir Dudley Digges was about the same time created master of the rolls: Noy, attorney-general: Littleton, solicitor-general. All these had likewise been parliamentary leaders; and were men eminent in their profession.

Laud.

In all ecclesiastical affairs, and even in many civil, Laud, bishop of London, had great influence

Sir Edw. Walker, p. 328.

Whitlocke, p. 13. May, p. 20.

over the king. This man was virtuous, if severity CHAP. of manners alone, and abstinence from pleasure, could deserve that name. He was learned, if polemical knowledge could entitle him to that praise. He was difinterested, but with unceasing industry he studied to exalt the priestly and prelatical character, which was his own. His zeal was unrelenting in the cause of religion; that is, in imposing, by rigorous measures, his own tenets and pious ceremonies on the obstinate puritans, who had profanely dared to oppose him. In prosecution of his holy purposes, he overlooked every human consideration; or, in other words, the heat and indifcretion of his temper made him neglect the views of prudence and rules of good manners. He was in this respect happy, that all his enemies were also imagined by him the declared enemies to loyalty and true piety, and that every exercise of his anger, by that means, became in his eyes a merit and a virtue. This was the man who acquired fo great

an ascentiant over Charles, and who led him, by the facility of his temper, into a conduct which

proved so fatal to himself and to his kingdoms.

THE humour of the nation ran at that time into Innovathe extreme opposite to superstition; and it was the church with difficulty that the ancient ceremonies to which men had been accustomed, and which had been fanctified by the practice of the first reformers, could be retained in divine fervice: Yet was this the time which Laud chose for the introduction of new ceremonies and observances. Besides that these were fure to displease as innovations, there lay, in the opinion of the public, another very forcible objection against them. Laud, and the other prelates who embraced his measures, were generally well instructed in sacred antiquity, and had adopted many of those religious sentiments which prevailed during the fourth and fifth centuries; when the Christian

x630.

CHAP. Christian church, as is well known, was already sunk into those superstitions which were afterwards continued and augmented by the policy of Rome. The revival, therefore, of the ideas and practices of that age, could not fail of giving the English faith and liturgy some resemblance to the catholic superstition, which the kingdom in general, and the puritans in particular, held in the greatest horror and detestation. Men also were apt to think, that, without some secret purpose, such infignificant obfervances would not be imposed with such unrelenting zeal on the refractory nation; and that Laud's scheme was to lead back the English by gradual steps to the religion of their ancestors. They confidered not, that the very infignificancy of these ceremonies recommended them to the superstitions prelate, and made them appear the more peculiarly facred and religious, as they could serve to no other purpose. Nor was the resemblance to the Romish ritual any objection, but rather a merit, with Laud and his brethren; who bore a much greater kindness to the mother-church, as they called her, than to the sectaries and presbyterians, and frequently recommended her as a true christian church; an appellation which they refused, or at least scrupled to give to the others k. So openly were these tenets espoused, that not only the discontented puritans believed the church of England to be relapfing fast into Romish superstition: The court of Rome itself entertained hopes of regaining its authority in this island; and, in order to forward Laud's supposed good intentions, an offer was twice made him, in private, of a cardinal's hat, which he declined accepting 1. His answer was, as he says himself, That fomething dwelt within him, which would not suffer his compliance, till Rome were other than it is in.

el Rush. vol. ii. p. 190. Welwood, p. 61. k May, p. 25. m Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 1327. Whitlocke, p. 97.

A court lady, daughter of the earl of Devon. CHAP. shire, having turned catholic, was asked by Laud the reason of her conversion. 'Tis chiesly, said the, because I hate to travel in a crowd. The meaning of this expression being demanded, she replied, I perceive your grace and many others are making haste to Rome; and therefore, in order to prevent my being crowded, I have gone before you. It must be confessed, that though Laud deserved not the appellation of papilt, the genius of his religion was, though in a less degree, the same with that of the Romish: The same profound respect was exacted to the facerdotal character, the same submission required to the creeds and decrees of synods and councils, the same pomp and ceremony was affected in worship, and the same superstitious regard to days, postures, meats, and vestments. No wonder, therefore, that this prelate was, every where, among the puritans, regarded with horror, as the forerunner of antichrist.

As a specimen of the new ceremonies to which Land facrificed his own quiet and that of the nation, it may not be amiss to relate those which he was accused of employing in the consecration of St. Catherine's church, and which were the object of fuch general scandal and offence.

On the bishop's approach to the west door of the church, a loud voice cried, Open, open, ye everlasting doors, that the king of glory may enter in! Immediately the doors of the church flew open, and the bishop entered. Falling upon his knees, with eyes elevated and arms expanded, he uttered these words: This place is holy, the ground is holy: In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoft, I pronounce it holy.

Going towards the chancel, he several times took up from the floor some of the dust, and threw it in the air. When he approached, with his attendants, near to the communion-table, he bowed frequently towards it: And on their return, they went round the church, repeating as they marched along, some of the psalms: And then said a form of prayer, which concluded with these words: We confectate this church, and separate it unto thee as holy ground, not to be profaned any more to common uses.

tendants,

AFTER this, the bishop, standing near the communion-table, solemnly pronounced many imprecations upon such as should afterwards pollute that holy place by musters of soldiers, or keeping in it profane law-courts, or carrying burdens through it. On the conclusion of every curse, he bowed towards the east, and cried, Let all the people say, Amen.

The imprecations being all to piously finished, there were poured out a number of blessings upon such as had any hand in framing and building that sacred and beautiful edifice, and on such as had given, or should hereafter give to it, any chalices, plate, ornaments, or utensils. At every benediction, he in like manner bowed towards the east, and cried, Let all the people say, Amen.

THE scrmon followed; after which, the bishop consecrated and administered the sacrament in the

following manner:

As he approached the communion-table, he made many lowly reverences: And coming up to that part of the table where the bread and wine lay, he bowed feven times. After the reading of many prayers, he approached the facramental elements, and gently lifted up the corner of the napkin in which the bread was placed. When he beheld the bread, he fuddenly let fall the napkin, flew back a step or two, bowed three feveral times towards the bread; then he drew nigh again, opened the napkin, and bowed as before.

NEXT, he laid his hand on the cup, which had a cover upon it, and was filled with wine. He let go the cup, fell back, and bowed thrice towards it. CHAP. He approached again; and lifting up the cover, LI peeped into the cup. Seeing the wine, he let fall the cover, started back, and bowed as before. Then he received the facrament, and gave it to others. And many prayers being said, the solemnity of the confecration ended. The walls and floor and roof of the fabric were then supposed to be sufficiently holv ".

ÓRDERS were given and rigorously insisted on, that the communion-table should be removed from the middle of the area, where it hitherto stood in all churches, except in cathedrals. It was placed at the cast end, railed in, and denominated an ALTAR; as the clergyman who officiated received commonly the appellation of PRIEST. It is not cafy to imagine the discontents excited by this innovation, and the fuspicions which it gave rise to.

THE kneeling at the altar, and the using of copes, a species of embroidered vestment, in administering the facrament, were also known to be great objects of scandal, as being popish practices: But the opposition rather increased than abated the zeal of the prelate for the introduction of these habits and ceremonies.

All kinds of ornament, especially pictures, were necessary for supporting that mechanical devotion, which was purposed to be raised in this model of religion: But as these had been so much employed by the church of Rome, and had given rife to fo much superstition, or what the puritans called idolatry; it was impossible to introduce them into English churches, without exciting general murmurs' and complaints. But Laud, possessed of present authority, persisted in his purpose, and made several attempts towards acquiring these ornaments. Some

n Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 76, 77. Welwood, p. 275. Franklyn. O Kushworth, vol. ii. p. 207. Whitlocke, p. 24. P. 386.

CHAP. of the pictures introduced by him were also found, upon inquiry, to be the very same that might be met with in the mass-book. The crucifix too, that eternal consolation of all pious catholics, and terror to all found protestants, was not forgotten on this occasion P.

IT was much remarked, that Sherfield, the recorder of Salisbury, was tried in the star-chamber, for having broken, contrary to the bishop of Salisbury's express injunctions, a painted window of St. Idmond's church in that city. He boasted, that he had destroyed these monuments of idolatry: But sor this effort of his zeal, he was fined 500 pounds, removed from his office, condemned to make a public acknowledgment, and be bound to his good behaviour 4.

Not only such of the clergy as neglected to obferve every ceremony were suspended and deprived by the high-commission court: Oaths were, by many of the bishops, imposed on the church-wardens; and they were fworin to inform against any one who acted contrary to the ecclesiastical canons i. Such a measure, though practised during the reign of Elizabeth, gave much offence; as relembling too nearly the practice of the Romith inquisition.

To shew the great alienation from the churches reformed after the presbyterian model, Laud advised, that the discipline and worship of the church should be imposed on the English regiments and tracking companies abroad. All foreigners of the Dutch and Walloon congregations were commanded to attend the established church; and indulgence was granted to none after the children of the first denizens'. Scudamore too, the king's ambaffador at Paris, had orders to withdraw himself from the

Rushworth, vol. ii. p.272. P. 451.

P Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 272, 273. 9 Ibid. p. 152. State Trials, vol. v. p. 46. Franklyn, p. 410, 411, 412. Rushworth, vol. ii. pe186. Ibid. p. 249. Franklyn, communion of the hugonots. Even men of sense CHAP. were apt to blame this conduct, not only because it gave offence in England, but because in foreign countries it lost the crown the advantage of being considered as the head and support of the reformation ".

1630.

On pretence of pacifying disputes, orders were issued from the council, forbidding, on both sides, all preaching and printing with regard to the controverted points of predestination and free-will. But i' was complained of, and probably with reason, that the impartiality was altogether confined to the orders, and that the execution of them was only meant against the Calvinists.

In return for Charles's indulgence towards the church, Laud and his followers took care to magnify, on every occasion; the regal authority, and to treat with the utmost disdain or detestation, all puritanical pretensions to a free and independent constitution. But while these prelates were so liberal in raising the crown at the expense of public liberty, they made no scruple of encroaching themselves on the royal rights the most incontestible; in order to exalt the hierarchy, and procure to their own order dominion and independence. All the doctrines which the Romish church had borrowed from some of the fathers, and which freed the spiritual from subordination to the civil power, were now adopted by the church of England, and interwoven with her political and religious tenets. A divine and apostolical charter was infifted on, preferably to a legal and parliamentary one ". The sacerdotal character was magnified as facred and indefeizable: All right to spiritual authority, or even to private judgment in spiritual subjects, was refused to profane laymen: Ecclesiastical courts were held by the bishops in their own name, without any notice taken of the

[&]quot; State Papers collected by the earl of Clarendon, p. 333. Whitlocke, p. 22.

C H A P. king's authority: And Charles, though, extremely jealous of every claim in popular assemblies, seemed rather to encourage than repress those encroachments of his clergy. Having felt many sensible inconveniences from the independent spirit of parliaments, he attached himself entirely to those who professed a devoted obedience to his crown and person; nor did he foresee that the ecclesiastical power which he exalted, not admitting of any precise boundary, might in time become more dangerous to public peace, and no less fatal to royal prerogative, than the other.

So early as the coronation, Laud was the person, according to general opinion, that introduced a novelty, which, though overlooked by Charles, made a deep impression on many of the byestanders. After the usual ceremonies these words were recited to the king: "Stand and hold fast, from hence-"forth, the place to which you have been heir by " the succession of your forefathers, being now de-" livered to you by the authority of Almighty God, " and by the hands of us and all the bishops and " servants of God. And, as you see the clergy to come nearer the altar than others, fo remember "that, in all places convenient, you give them " greater honour; that the Mediator of God and " man may establish you on the kingly throne, to "be a mediator betwixt the clergy and the laity; " and that you may reign for ever with Jesus "Christ, the King of kings, and Lord of lords "."

'THE principles which exalted prerogative, were not entertained by the king merely as foft and agrecable to his royal ears: They were also put in practice during the time that he ruled without parliaments. Though frugal and regular in his expence, he wanted money for the support of government; and he levied it either by the revival of obsolete laws, or by violations, some more open, some more disguised, of the privileges of the nation. Though humane and CHAP. gentle in his temper, he gave way to a few severities in the star-chamber and high-commission, which feemed necessary, in order to support the present mode of administration, and repress the rising spirit of liberty throughout the kingdom. Under these two heads may be reduced all the remarkable transactions of this reign, during some years: For, in peaceable and prosperous times, where a neutrality in foreign assairs is observed, scarcely any thing is remarkable, but what is, in some degree, blamed or blame-And, lest the hope of relief or protection from parliament might encourage opposition, Charles issued a proclamation, in which he declared, "That " whereas, for feveral ill ends, the calling again of " a parliament is divulged; though his majesty has " shown, by frequent meetings with his people, " his love to the use of parliaments: Yet the late " abuse having, for the present, driven him un-" willingly out of that course; he will account it " presumption for any one to prescribe to him any "time for the calling of that affembly "." This was generally construed as a declaration, that, during this reign, no more parliaments were intended to be summoned z. And every measure of the king's confirmed a suspicion, so disagreeable to the generality of the people.

^{*} Franklyn, p. 114. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 201.

LII.

1630.

money.

TONNAGE and poundage continued to be levied by Irregular the royal authority alone. The former additional im- levies of positions were still exacted. Even new impositions were laid on several kinds of merchandise 2,

THE custom-house officers received orders from the council to enter into any house, warchouse, or cellar; to fearch any trunk or cheft; and to break any bulk whatever; in default of the payment of customs b.

⁷ Parl. Hift. vol. viii. p. 389. Rush. vol. ii. p. 3. 2 Rush. vol. ii. p. 8. May, don, vol. i. p. 4. May, p. 14. b Rush, vol. ii. p. 9. p. 16.

In order to exercise the militia, and to keep them in good order, each county, by an edict of the council, was assessed in a certain sum, for maintaining a muster-master, appointed for that service.

Compositions were openly made with reculants, and the popish religion became a regular part of the revenue. This was all the persecution which it underwent during the reign of Charles d.

A commission was granted for compounding with such as were possessed of crown-lands upon defective titles; and on this pretence, some money

was exacted from the people '.

THERE was a law of Edward II., That whoever was possessed of twenty pounds a-year in land, should be obliged, when summoned, to appear and to receive the order of knighthood. Twenty pounds, at that time, partly by the change of denomination, partly by that in the value of money, were equivalent to 200 in the seventeenth century; and it seemed just, that the king should not strictly insist on the letter of the law, and oblige people of so small revenue to accept of that expensive honour. Edward VI. z, and queen Elizabeth h, who had both of them made use of this expedient for raising money, had summoned only those who were possessed of forty pounds a-year and upwards to receive knighthood, or compound for their neglect; and Charles imitated their example, in granting the same indulgence. Commissioners were appointed for fixing the rates of composition; and instructions were given to these commissioners, not to accept of a less sum than would have been due by the party, upon a tax of three subsidies and a half i. Nothing proves more plainly, how ill-disposed the people were to the

Rush. vol. ii. p. 10.

Idem, ibid. p. 11, 12, 13. 247.

Idem, ibid. p. 49.

Statutum de militibus.

Rush. vol. ii.

P. 70, 71, 72. May, p. 16.

measures of the crown, than to observe, that they CHAP. loudly complained of an expedient, founded on positive statute, and warranted by such recent precedents. The law was pretended to be obsolete; though only one reign had intervened fince the last execution of it.

1630.

BARNARD, lecturer of St. Sepulchre's, London, Scretities used this expression in his prayer before sermon; of the star-Lord, open the eyes of the queen's majesty, that she may see Jesus Christ, whom she has pierced with her commitinfidelity, superstition, and idolatry. He was queftioned in the high-commission court, for this insult on the queen; but, upon his submission, dismissed k. Leighton, who had written libels against the king, the queen, the bishops, and the whole administration, was condemned by a very severe, if not a cruel, fentence; but the execution of it was suspended for . some time, in expectation of his submission!. All the severities, indeed, of this reign were exercised against those who triumphed in their sufferings, who courted perfecution, and braved authority: And, on that account, their punishment may be deemed the more just, but the less prudent. To have neglected them entirely, had it been consistent with order and public fafety, had been the wisest measure that could have been embraced; as perhaps it had been the most severe punishment that could have been inflicted on these zcalots.

chamber and high

In order to gratify the clergy with a magnificent fabric, subscriptions were set on foot, for repairing and rebuilding St. Paul's; and the king, by his countenance and example, encouraged this laudable undertaking m. By order of the privy-council, St. Gregory's church was removed, as an impediment to the project of extending and beautifying the cathedral. Some houses and shops likewise were 1631.

k Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 32. vol. iii. p. 60. Whitlocke, p. 15-

¹ Kennet's complete Hist. m ldem, p. 17.

LII. 1631

CHAP, pulled down; and compensation was made to the owners. As there was no immediate prospect of affembling a parliament, such acts of power in the king became necessary; and in no former age would the people have entertained any scruple with regard to them. It must be remarked, that the puritans were extremely averse to the raising of this ornament to the capital. It favoured, as they pretended, of popish superstition.

> A STAMP duty was imposed on cards: A new. tax, which, of itself, was liable to no objection; but appeared of dangerous consequence, when confidered as arbitrary and illegal °.

Monopolies were revived; an oppressive method of levying money, being unlimited, as well as destructive of industry. The last parliament of James, which abolished monopolies, had left an equitable exception in favour of new inventions; and on pretence of these, and of erecting new companies and corporations, was this grievance now renewed. The manufacture of foap was given to a company who paid a fum for their patent p. Leather, falt, and many other commodities, even down to linen rags, were put under restrictions.

IT is affirmed by Clarendon, that so little benefit was reaped from these projects, that of 200,000 pounds thereby levied on the people, scarcely 1500 came into the king's coffers. Though we ought not to suspect the noble historian of exaggerations to the disadvantage of Charles's measures; this fact, it must be owned, appears somewhat incredible. The fame author adds, that the king's intention was to teach his subjects how unthrifty a thing it was to refuse reasonable supplies to the crown. imprudent project! to offend a whole nation, under the view of punishment; and to hope, by acts of

n Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 88, 89, 90. 207. 462. 718. · Idein, ibid. p. 103. P Ruthworth, vol. ji. p. 136. 142. 189. 252.

being possessed of any force to prevent resistance.

The council of York had been first erected, after 1632.

THE council of York had been first erected, after a rebellion, by a patent from Henry VIII. without any authority of parliament; and this exercise of power, like many others, was indulged to that arbitrary monarch. This council had long acted chiefly as a criminal court; but, besides some innovations introduced by James, Charles thought pro-.per, some time after Wentworth was made president, to extend its powers, and to give it a large civil jurisdiction, and that in some respects discretionary. It is not improbable that the king's intention was only to prevent inconveniencies, which arose from the bringing of every cause, from the most distant parts of the kingdom, into Westminster-hall: But the confequence, in the mean time, of this measure, was the putting of all the northern counties out of the protection of ordinary law, and subjecting them to an authority somewhat arbitrary. Some irregular acts of that council were, this year, complained of .

The court of star-chamber extended its authority; and it was matter of complaint, that it encroached upon the jurisdiction of the other courts; imposing heavy fines and inflicting severe punishment, beyond the usual course of justice. Sir David Foulis was fined 5000 pounds, chiefly because he had dissuaded a friend from compounding with the commissioners of knighthood 3.

PRYNNE, a barrister of Lincoln's-Inn, had written an enormous quarto of a thousand pages, which he called Histrio-Mastyw. Its professed purpose was to decry stage-plays, comedies, interludes, music, dancing; but the author likewise took occasion to declaim against hunting, public festivals, Christmas-keeping,

1633.

Rushworth, vol ii. p. 158, 159, &c. Franklyn, p. 412.

^r Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 202, 203. ⁵ Ibid. vol. ii. p. 215, 216, &c.

CHAP. keeping, bonfires, and Maypoles. His zeal against all these levities, he says, was first moved by ob-1633. ferving, that plays fold better than the choicest fermons, and that they were frequently printed on finer paper than the Bible itself. Besides, that the players were often papifts, and desperately wicked; the play-houses, he affirms, are Satan's chapels, the play-haunters little better than incarnate devils; and fo many steps in a dance, so many paces to hell. The chief crime of Nero he represents to have been, his frequenting and acting of plays; and those, who nobly conspired his death, were principally moved to it, as he affirms, by their indignation at that enormity. The rest of his thousand pages is of a like strain. He had obtained a licence from archbishop Abbot's chaplain; yet was he indicted in the star-chamber as a libeller. It was thought somewhat hard, that general invectives against plays should be interpreted into fatires against the king and queen, merely because they frequented these amusements, and because the queen sometimes acted a part in pastorals and interludes, which were represented at court. The author, it must be owned, had, in plainer terms, blamed the hierarchy, the ceremonies, the innovations in religious worship, and the new superstitions, introduced by Laud'; and this, probahly, together with the obstinacy and petulance of his behaviour before the star-chamber, was the reafon why his sentence was so severe. He was condemned to be put from the bar; to stand on the pillory in two places, Westminster and Cheapside; to lose both his ears, one in each place; to pay 5000

pounds

^{*} The munc in the churches, he affirmed not to be the noise of men, but a bleating of brute beafts; choirifters bellow the tenor, as it were oxen; back a counterpart, as it were a kennel of dogs; 10ar out a treble, as it were a fort of bulls; and grunt out a base, as it were a number of hogs; Christmas, as it is kept, is the devil's Christmas; and Prynne employed a great number of pages to perfuade men to offect the name of Puritant as if Christ had been a Puritan; and so he faith in his Index. Rush. vol. ii. p. 223.

pounds fine to the king; and to be imprisoned CHAP.

during life".

This same Prynne was a great hero among the puritans; and it was chiefly with a view of mortifying that fect, that, though of an honourable profession, he was condemned by the star-chamber to so ignominious a punishment. The thorough-paced puritans were distinguishable by the sourness and austerity of their manners, and by their aversion to all pleasure and fociety w. To inspire them with better humour was certainly, both for their own fake and that of the public, a laudable intention in the court; but whether pillories, fines, and prisons, were proper expedients for that purpose, may admit of some question.

Another expedient which the king tried in order to infuse cheerfulness into the national devotion, was not much more successful. He renewed his father's edich for allowing sports and recreations on Sunday to luch as attended public worship; and he ordered his proclamation for that purpose to be publicly read by the clergy after divine service*. Those, who were puritanically affected refused obedience, and were punished by suspension or deprivation. The differences between the sects were before sufficiently great; nor was it necessary to widen them farther by these inventions.

Some encouragement and protection, which the king and the bishops gave to wakes, church-ales, bride-ales, and other cheerful festivals of the common people, were the objects of like scandal to the puritans y.

This year Charles made a journey to Scotland, June 12, attended by the court, in order to hold a parliament there, and to pass through the ceremony of his

u Rush. vol. ii. p. 220, 221, &c. W Dugdale, p. 2. * Rush. vol. ii. p. 193. 459. Whitlocke, p. 16, 17. Franklyn, y Rush. vol. ii. p. 191, 192. May, p. 2.

CHAP. coronation. The nobility and gentry of both kingdoms rivalled each other, in expressing all duty and respect to the king, and in showing mutual friendship and regard to each other. No one could have suspected, from exterior appearances, that such dreadful scenes were approaching.

ONE chief article of business (for it deserves the name) which the king transacted in this parliament, was, befittes obtaining fome fupply, to procure authority for ordering the habits of clergymen. The act did not pais without opposition and difficulty. The dreadful furplice was before men's eyes; and they apprehended, with some reason, that, under sanction of the law, it would soon be introduced among them. Though the king believed that his prerogative entitled him to a power, in general, of directing whatever belonged to the exterior government of the church, this was deemed a matter of

IMMEDIATELY after the king's return to England, he heard of archbishop Abbot's death: And, without delay, he conferred that dignity on his favourite, Laud; who, by this accession of authority, was now enabled to maintain ecclesiastical discipline with greater rigour, and to aggravate the general difcontent in the nation.

too great importance to be ordered without the

LAUD obtained the bishopric of London for his friend Juxon; and, about a year after the death of sir Richard Weston, created earl of Portland, had interest enough to engage the king to make that prelate high treasurer. Juxon was a person of great integrity, mildness, and humanity, and endued with a good understanding. Yet did this last promotion give general offence. His birth and character were deemed too obscure for a man raised fanction of a particular statute.

z Rush. vol. ii. p. 183.

^{*} Whitlocke, p. 423. Clarendon, vol. i. p. 99.

to one of the highest offices of the crown. And the CHAP. clergy, it was thought, were already too much elated by former instances of the king's attachment to them, and needed not this farther encouragement to assume dominion over the laity b. The puritans, likewise, were much dissatisfied with Juxon, notwithstanding his eminent virtues, because he was a lover of profane field-sports, and hunting.

Ship-money was now introduced. • The first 1634. writs of this kind had been directed to fea-port Ship-motowns only: But ship-money was at this time levied on the whole kingdom; and each county was rated at a particular fum, which was afterwards affested upon individuals. The amount of the whole tax was very moderate, little exceeding 200,000 pounds: It was levied upon the people with equality: The money was entirely expended on the navy, to the great honour and advantage of the kingdom: As England had no military force, while all the other powers of Europe were strongly armed, a sleet feemed absolutely necessary for her security: And it was obvious that a navy must be built and equipped at leifure, during peace; nor could it possibly be fitted out on a sudden emergence, when the danger became urgent: Yet all these considerations could not reconcile the people to the imposition. It was entirely arbitrary: By the same right any other tax might be imposed: And men thought a powerful fleet, though very defirable both for the credit and fafety of the kingdom, but an unequal recompence for their liberties, which, they apprehended, were thus facrificed to the obtaining of it.

England, it must be owned, was, in this respect, unhappy in its present situation, that the king had entertained a very different idea of the constitution, from that which began in general to prevail among his subjects. He did not regard national

privileges

1633.

b Clarendon, vol. i. p. 97. May, p. 21. Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 257, 258, &c.

CHAP. privileges as so facred and inviolable, that nothing but the most extreme necessity could justify an in-fringement of them. He considered himself as the supreme magistrate, to whose care heaven, by his birth-right, had committed his people, whose duty it was to provide for their fecurity and happiness, and who was vested with ample discretionary powers for that falutary purpose. If the observance of ancient laws and customs was consistent with the prefent convenience of government, he thought himself obliged to comply with that rule; as the casiest, the fafest, and what procured the most prompt and willing obedience. But when a change of circumstances, especially if derived from the obstinacy of the people, required a new plan of administration, national privileges, he thought, must yield to supreme power; nor could any order of the state oppose any right to the will of the sovereign, directed to the good of the public. That these principles of government were derived from the uniform tenor of the English laws, it would be rash to affirm. The fluctuating nature of the constitution, the impatient humour of the people, and the variety of events had, no doubt, in different ages, produced exceptions and contradictions. These observations alone may be established on both sides, that the appearances were sufficiently strong in favour of the king to apologife for his following fuch maxims; and that public liberty must be so precarious under this exorbitant prerogative, as to render an opposition not only excusable, but laudable in the people .

Some laws had been enacted, during the reign of Henry VII. against depopulation, or the converting of arable lands into pasture. By a decree of the star-chamber, sir Anthony Roper was fined 4000 pounds for an offence of that nature. This severe

d Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 535. 542.

Sec note [Y] at the end of the volume. f Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 270. Vol. iii. App. p. 206.

sentence was intended to terrify others into com- CHAP. position; and above 30,000 pounds were levied by LII. that expedient g. Like compositions, or, in default of them, heavy fines, were required for incroachments on the king's forests; whose bounds, by decrees deemed arbitrary, were extended much beyond what was usual h. The bounds of one forest, that of Rockingham, were increased from six miles to fixty'. The same refractory humour which made the people refuse to the king voluntary supplies, disposed them with better reason to murmur against. thefe irregular methods of taxation.

Morley was fined 10,000 pounds for reviling, challenging, and striking, in the court of Whitehall, fir George Theobald, one of the king's fervants k. This fine was thought exorbitant; but whether it was compounded, as was usual in fines imposed by the star-chamber, we are not informed.

ALLISON had reported, that the archbishop of York had incurred the king's displeasure, by asking a limited toleration for the catholics, and an allowance to build some churches for the exercise of their religion. For this slander against the archbishop, he was condemned in the star-chamber to be fined 1000 pounds, to be committed to prison, to be bound to his good behaviour during life, to be whipped, and to be fet in the pillory at Westminfler, and in three other towns in England. Robins, who had been an accomplice in the guilt, was condemned by a sentence equally severe?. Such events are rather to be confidered as rare and detached incidents, collected by the severe scrutiny of historians, than as proofs of the prevailing genius of the king's administration, which seems to have been more gentle and equitable than that of most of his

¹º Idem, vol. iii. p. 333. Franklyn, p. 478. h May, p. 16. ' Strafford's Letters and Ditpatches, vol. ii. p. 217.

Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 270.

CHA LII. 1634.

predccessors: There were, on the whole, only five or fix fuch instances of rigour during the course of fifteen years, which elapsed before the meeting of the long parliament. And it is also certain, that scandal against the great, though seldom prosecuted at present, is, however, in the eye of the law, a great crime, and subjects the offender to very heavy penalties.

THERE are other instances of the high respect paid to the nobility and to the great in that age; when the powers of monarchy, though disputed; still maintained themselves in their pristine vigour. Clarendon m tells us a pleafant incident to this purpose: A waterman belonging to a man of quality, having a squabble with a citizen about his fare, showed his badge, the crest of his master, which happened to be a fwan; and thence infifted on better treatment from the cirizen. But the other replied carelessly, that he did not trouble his head about that goose. For this offence he was summoned before the marshal's court; was fined, as having opprobriously desamed the nobleman's crest, by calling the swan a goose; and was in effect reduced to beggary.

SIR Richard Granvile had thought himself illused by the earl of Suffolk in a law-suit; and he was accused before the star-chamber of having said of that nobleman, that he was a base lord. The evidence against him was somewhat lame; yet, for this flight offence, infussiciently proved, he was condemned to pay a fine of 8000 pounds; one half to the earl, the other to the king".

SIR George Markham, following a chase where lord Darcy's huntsman was exercising his hounds, kept closer to the dogs than was thought proper by the huntsman, who, besides other rudencis, gave

a Lord Landdown, p. 514.

m Life of Clarendon, vol. i. p. 72.

him foul language, which fir George returned with CHAP. a stroke of his whip. The fellow threatened to LII. complain to his master: The knight replied, If his 1634. maker should justify such insolence, he would serve him in the same manner, or words to that effect. Sir George was summoned before the star-chamber, and fined 10,000 pounds. So fine a thing was it in thise days to be a lord!——A natural reflection of lord Lanfdown's, in relating this incident of The people, in vindicating their liberties from the authority of the crown, threw oil also the yoke of the nobility. It is proper to remark, that this last incident happened early in the reign of James. The present practice of the star-chamber was far from being an innovation; though the present dispositions of the people made them repine more at this · fervitude.

CHARLES had imitated the example of Elizabeth and James, and had iffued proclamations forbidding the landed gentlemen and the nobility to live idly in London, and ordering them to retire to their country-feats. For disobedience to this edict, many were indicted by the attorney-general, and were fined in the star-chamber. This occasioned discontents; and the sentences were complained of, as illegal. But if proclamations had authority, of which nobody pretended to doubt, must they not be put in execution? In no instance, I must confess, does it more evidently appear, what contused and uncertain ideas were, during that age, entertained concerning the English constitution.

RAY, having exported fullers earth, contrary to the king's proclamation, was, besides the pillory, Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 144. 9 Idem, ibid. p. 288.

Vol. VI. x condemned

1635.

Lord Lansdown, p. 515. This story is told differently in Hobart's Reports, p. 120. It there appears, that Markham was fined only 500 pounds, and very deservedly: For he gave the lie and wrote a challenge to lord D'Arcy. James was anxious to discourage the practice of duelling, which was then very prevalent.

CHAP. condemned in the star-chamber to a fine of 2000 pounds. Like fines were levied on Terry, Eman, and others, for disobeying a proclamation which forbad the exportation of gold. In order to count for the subsequent convulsions, even these incidents are not to be everlooked, as frivolous or contemptible. Such severities were afterwards magnified into the greatest enormities.

THERE remains a proclamation of this year, prohibiting hackney-coaches from standing in the street. We are told, that where were not above twenty coaches of that kind in London. There are, at present, near eight hundred.

A formidable fleet of fixty fail, the greatest that England had ever known, was equipped under the earl of Northumberland, who had orders to attack the herring-busses of the Dutch, which fished in what were called the British Seas. The Dutch were content to pay 30,000 pounds for a licence during this year. They openly denied, however, the claim of dominion in the seas beyond the friths, bays, and shores; and it may be questioned, whether the laws of nations warrant any farther pretensions.

This year the king sent a squadron against Sallee; and, with the assistance of the emperor of Morocco, destroyed that receptacle of pirates, by whom the English commerce, and even the English coasts, had long been insested.

Burton, a divine, and Bastwick, a physician, were tried in the star-chamber for seditious and schismatical libels, and were condemned to the same punishment that had been inslicted on Prynne. Prynne himself was tried for a new offence; and, together with another fine of 5000 pounds, was condemned CHAP to lose what remained of his ears. Besides that these writers had attacked with great severity, and even an intemperate zeal, the ceremonies, rites, and government of the church; the very answers which they gave in to the court were so full of contumacy and of invectives against the prelates, that no lawyer could be prevailed on to fign them ". The rigours, however, which they underwent, being so unworthy men of their profession, gave general offence; and the patience, or rather afacrity, with which they suffered, increased still farther the indignation of the public ".. The severity of the star-chamber, which was generally ascribed to Laud's passionate disposition, was, perhaps, in itself somewhat blameable; but will naturally, to us, appear enormous, who enjoy, in the utmost latitude, that liberty of the press, which is esteemed so necessary in every monarchy, confined by strict legal limitations. But as these limitations were not regularly fixed during the age of Charles, nor at any time before; so was this liberty totally unknown, and was generally deemed, as well as religious toleration, incompatible with all good government. No age or nation, among the moderns, had ever set an example of such an indulgence: And it seems unreasonable to judge of the measures embraced during one period, by the maxims which prevail in another.

1 ldem, ibid. p. 316.

Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 348. * Idem, ibid. p. 350.

Burton, in his book where he complained of innovations, mentioned among others, that a certain Wednesday had been appointed for a fast, and that the fast was ordered to be celebrated without any fermons. The intention, as he pretended, of that novelty was, by the example of a fast without sermons, to suppress all the Wednesday's lectures in London. It is observable, that the church of Rome

Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 381, 382, Sc. State Trials, vol. v. p. 66. "State Trials, vol. v. p. 80? * Ibid. p. 74. Franklyn, p. 839.

CHAP, and that of England, being both of them lovers of form and ceremony and order, are more friends to prayer than preaching; while the pufitanical fectaries, who find that the latter method of address, being directed to a numerous audience present and visible, is more inflaming and animating, have always regarded it as the chief part of divine service. Such circumstances, though minute, it may not be improper to transmit to posterity; that those, who are curious of tracing the history of the human mind, may remark how fai its several singularities coincide in different ages.

CERTAIN zealots had Irected themselves into a fociety for buying in of impropriations, and transferring them to the church; and great sums of money had been bequeathed to the fociety for these purpoles. But it was foon observed, that the only use which they made of their funds, was, to establish lecturers in all the confiderable churches; men who, without being subjected to episcopal authority, employed themselves entirely in preaching and spreading the fire of puritanism. Laud took care by a decree, which was passed in the court of exchequer, and which was much complained of, to abolish this fociety, and to stop their progress. It was, however, still observed, that throughout England the lecturers were all of them puritanically affected; and from them the clergymen, who contented themselves with reading prayers and homilies to the people, commonly received the reproachful appellation of dumb dogs.

THE puritans, restrained in England, shipped themselves off for America, and laid there the foundations of a government which possessed all the liberty, both civil and religious, of which they found But" themselves bereaved in their native country.

History y Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 150, 151. Whitlocke, p. 15. of the Life and Sufferings of Laud, p 211, 212.

their enemies, unwilling that they should any where CHAP. enjoy ease and contentment, and dreading, perhaps, the dangerous consequences of so disassected a colony, prevailed on the king to issue a proclamation, debarring these devotees access even into those inhospitable descrts x. Eight ships, lying in the Thames, and ready to fail, were detained by order of the council; and in these were embarked sir Arthur. Hazelrig, John Hambden, John Pym, and Oliver Cromwel, who had resolved for ever to abandon their native country, and fly to the other extremity of the globe; where they might enjoy lectures and discourses of any length or form which pleased them. The king had afterwards full-leifure to repent this exercise of his authority."

THE bishop of Norwich, by rigorously insisting on uniformity, had, banished many industrious tradefinen from that city, and chased them into Holland². The Dutch began to be more intent on commerce than on orthodoxy; and thought that the knowledge of useful arts and obedience to the laws formed a good citizen; though attended with errors in subjects where it is not allowable for human nature to expect any politive truth or certainty.

COMPLAINTS about this time were made, that the petition of right was, in some instances, violated, and that, upon a commitment by the king and council, bail or releasement had been refused to Jennings, Pargiter, and Danvers ^a.

WILLIAMS, bishop of Lincoln, a man of spirit and learning, a popular prelate, and who had been

² May, p. 82. * Rush. vol. ii. p. 414.

lord

^{*} Ruch, vol. ii. p. 409. 478. Y Mather's Hittory of New England, book i. Dugdale. Bates. Hutchinson's Hift, of Massachulet's Bay, vol. i. p. 42. This last quoted author puts the fact beyond controverly. And it is a curious fact, as well with regard to the characters of the men, as of the times. Can any one doubt, that the entuing quarrel was almost entuely theological; not political? What might be expected of the populace, when fuch was the charaster of the most ensightened leaders?

CHAP. lord keeper, was fined 10,000 pounds by the starchamber, committed to the Tower during the king's pleasure, and suspended from his office. This severe sentence was founded on frivolous pretences, and was more ascribed to Laud's vengeance, than to any guilt of the bishop b. Laud, however, had owed his first promotion to the good offices of that prelate with king James. But so implacable was the haughty primate, that he raised up a new prosecution against Williams, on the strangest pretence imaginable. In order to lety the fine above mentioned, some officers had been sent to seize all the furniture and books of his piscopal palace of Lincoln; and in runmaging the house, they sound in a corner some neglected letters, which had been thrown by as useless. These letters were written by one Osbaldistone, a schoolmaster, and were directed to Williams. Mention was there made of a little great man; and in another passage, the same person was denominated a little urchin. By inferences and constructions, these epithets were applied to Laud; and on no better foundation was Williams tried anew, as having received fcandalous letters, and not discovering that private correspondence. For this offence another fine of 8000 pounds was levied on him: Osbaldistone was likewise brought to trial, and condemned to pay a fine of 5000 pounds, and to have his cars nailed to the pillory before his own school. He saved himself by slight; and left a note in his study, wherein he said, "That he was gone 66 beyond Canterbury "."

THESE prosecutions of Williams seem to have been the most iniquitous measure pursued by the court during the time that the use of parliaments was suspended. Williams had been indebted for all his fortune to the favour of James; but having quarrelled, first with Buckingham, then with Laud, he threw himself into the country party; and with great CHAP. firmness and vigour opposed all the measures of the king. A creature of the court to become its obstinate enemy, a bishop to countenance puritans; these circumstances excited indignation, and engaged the ministers in those severe measures. Not to mention, what some writers relate, that, before the sentence was pronounced against him, Williams was offered a pardon upon his submission, which he refused to make. The court was apt to think, that so refractory a spirit must by any expedient be broken and subdued.

b Russworth, vol. ii. p. 416, &c.

^{&#}x27; Ibid. p. 803, &c. Whitiocke, p. 25.

In a former trial, which Williams underwent d, (for these were not the first,) there was mentioned, in court, a story, which, as it discovers the genius of parties, may be worth relating. Sir John Lambe urging him to profecute the puritans, the prelate asked, what fort of people these same puritans were? Sir John replied, "That to the world, they seemed to be fuch as would not fwear, whore, or be drunk; "but they would lie, cozen, and deceive: That they would frequently hear two fermons a-day, "and repeat them too, and that sometimes they would fast all day long." This character must be conceived to be fatirical; yet it may be allowed, that that fect was more averse to such irregularities as proceed from the excess of gaiety and pleasure, than to those enormities which are the most destructive of society. The former were opposite to the very genius and spirit of their religion; the latter were only a transgression of its precepts: And it was not difficult for a gloomy enthulialt to convince himself, that a strict observance of the one would atone for any violation of the other.

In 1632, the treasurer, Portland, had insisted with the vintuers, that they should submit to a tax of a penny a quart upon all the wine which they

⁴ Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 416.

CHAP. retailed. But they rejected the demand. In order to punish them, a decree, suddenly, without much inquiry or examination, passed in the star-chamber, prohibiting them to sell or dress victuals in their houses. Two years after, they were questioned for the breach of this decree; and in order to avoid punishment, they agreed to lend the king six thousand pounds. Being threatened, during the subsequent years, with sines and prosecutions, they at last compounded the matter and submitted to pay half of that duty which was at first demanded of them. It required little so esight to perceive that the king's right of issuing proclamations must, if profecuted, draw on a power of taxation.

LILBURKI was accused before the star-chamber of publishing and dispersing seditious pamphlets. He was ordered to be examined; but refused to take the oath usual in that court, that he would answer interrogatories, even though they might lead him to accuse himself. For this contempt, as it was interpreted, he was condemned to be whipped, pilloried, and imprifeneel. While he was whipped at the cart, and stord on the pillory, he harangued the populace, and declaimed violently against the tyranny of bishore. From his pockets also he scattered pamphlets, said to be seditious; because they attacked the hierarchy. The star-chamber, which was fitting at that very time, ordered him immediately to be gagged. He ceased not, however, though both gatged and pilloried, to stamp with his foot, and gesticulate, in order to show the people, that, if he had it in his power, he would still harangue them. This he wicur gave fresh provocation to the starchamber; and they condemned him to be imprisoned in a dungeon, and to be loaded with irons g. It was found difficult to break the spirits of men who placed. both their honour and their conscience in suffering.

Rishwath, vol. ii. p. 197.

f Idem, ibid. p. 451.

THE jealousy of the church appeared in another CHAP. instance less tragical. Archy, the king's fool, who, by his office, had the privilege of jesting on his 1637. master, and the whole court, happened unluckily to try his wit upon Laud; who was too facred a person to be played with. News having arrived from Scotland of the first commotions excited by the liturgy, Archy seeing the primate pass by, called to him, Who's fool, now, my lord? For this offence, Archy was ordered, by sentence of the council, to have his coat pulled over his head, and to be dif-missed the king's service h.

HERE is another instance of that rigorous subjection in which all med were held by Laud.. Some young gentlemen of Lincoln's-inn, heated by their cups, having drunk confusion to the archbishop, were at his instigation cited before the star-chamber. They applied to the earl of Dorset for protection. Who bears witness against you? said Dorset. One of the drawers, they faid. Where did he stand, when you were supposed to drink this health? subjoined the earl. He was at the door, they replied, going out of the room. Tush! cried he, the drawer was mistaken: You drank confusion, to the archbishop of Canterbury's enemies; and the fellow was gone before you pronounced the last word. This hint supplied the young gentlemen with a new method of defence: And being advised by Dorset to behave with great humility and great submission to the primate; the modesty of their carriage, the ingenuity of their apology, with the patronage of that noble lord, faved them from any severer punishment than a reproof and admonition, with which they were dismissed '.

This year, John Hambden acquired, by his spirit Trial of and courage, universal popularity throughout the Hambden. nation, and has merited great renown with posterity, for the bold stand which he made in defence of

h Rush. vol. ii. p. 470. Welwood, p. 278. 1 Rush. vol. iii. p. 180.

CIIAP. the laws and liberties of his country. After the imposing of ship-money, Charles, in order to discourage all opposition, had proposed this question £637. to the judges: "Whether, in a case of necessity, for the desence of the kingdom, he might not "impose this taxation; and whether he were not fole judge of the necessity?" These guardians of law and liberty replied with great complaifance, That in, a case of necessty he might impose that " taxation, and that he was fole judge of the necessity *:" Hambden had been rated at twenty shillings, for an estate which he possessed in the county of Buckingham: Yet notwithstanding this declared opinion of the judges, notwithstanding the great power, and sometimes rigorous maxims of the crown, notwithstanding the small prospect of relief from parliament; he resolved, rather than tamely fubmit to so illegal an imposition, to stand a legal profecution, and expose himself to all the indignation of the court. The case was argued during twelve days, in the exchequer-chamber, before all the judges of England; and the nation regarded, with the utinost anxiety, every circumstance of this celebrated trial. The event was easily forescen: But the principles, and reasonings, and behaviour of the parties engaged in the trial, were much canvassed and inquired into; and nothing could equal the favour paid to the one fide, except the hatred which attended the other.

In was urged by Hambden's counsel, and by his partisans in the nation, that the plea of necessity was in vain introduced into a trial of law; since it was the nature of necessity to abolish all law, and, by irresistible violence, to dissolve all the weaker and more artificial ties of human society. Not only the prince, in cases of extreme distress, is exempted from the ordinary rules of administration: All orders of men are then levelled; and any individual may confult the public fafety by any expedient which his CHAP. fituation enables him to employ. But to produce LII. so violent an effect, and so hazardous to every community, an ordinary danger or difficulty is not fufficient; much less, a necessity which is merely fictitious and pretended. Where the peril is urgent and extreme, it will be palpable to every member of the fociety; and though all ancient rules of government are in that case abrogated, men will readily, of themselves, submit to that irregular authority, which is exerted for their preservation. But what is there in dommon between such suppositions, and the present condition of the nation? England enjoys a profound reace with all her neighbours: And what is more, all her neighbours are engaged in furious and bloody wars among themselves, and by their mutual enmities farther ensure her tranquillity. The very writs themselves, which are issued for the levying of ship-money, contradict the supposition of necessity, and pretend only that the seas are infested with pirates; a slight and temporary inconvenience, which may well await a legal supply from parliament. The writs likewise allow several months for equipping the ships; which proves a very calm and deliberate species of necessity, and one that admits of delay much beyond the forty days requisite for fummoning that assembly. It is strange too, that an extreme necessity which is always apparent, and usually comes to a sudden crisis, should now have continued, without interruption, for near four years, and should have remained, during so long a time, invisible to the whole kingdom. And as to the pretention, that the king is sole judge of the necessity; what is this but to subject all the privileges of the nation to his arbitrary will and pleasure? To expect that the public will be convinced by fuch reasoning, must aggravate the general indignation; by adding, to violence against men's persons and their property, so cruel a mockery of their understanding.

[&]amp; Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 355. Whitlocke, p. 24.

1637.

CHAP. LII. 2637.

In vain are precedents of ancient writs produced: These writs, when examined, are only found to require the fea-ports, sometimes at their own charge, fometimes at the charge of the counties, to fend their ships for the defence of the nation. Even the prerogative, which empowered the crown to iffue fuch writs, is abolished, and its exercise almost entirely discontinued from the time of Edward III.'; and all the authority which remained, or was afterwards exercised, was to press ships into the public fervice, to be paid for by the public. How wide are these precedents from a power or obliging the peo-ple, at their own charge, to build new ships, to victual and pay them, for the public; nay, to furnish money to the crown for that perpose! What fecurity either against the farther extension of this claim, or against diverting to other purposes the public money, so levied? The plea of necessity would warrant any other taxation as well as that of ship-money: Wherever any difficulty shall occur, the administration, instead of endeavouring to elude or overcome it by gentle and prudent measures, will instantly represent it as a reason for infringing all ancient laws and institutions: And if fuch maxims and fuch practices prevail, what has become of national liberty? What authority is left to the great charter, to the statutes, and to that very petition of right, which, in the present reign, had been so solemnly enacted by the concurrence of the whole legislature?

THE defenceless condition of the kingdom while unprovided with a navy; the inability of the king, from his established revenues, with the utmost care and frugality, to equip and maintain one; the impossibility of obtaining, on reasonable terms, any voluntary supply from parliament: All these are reasons of state, not topics of law. If these reasons appear to the king so urgent as to dispense with the legal rules of government; let him enforce his CHAP. edicts by his court of star-chamber, the proper instrument of irregular and absolute power; not prostitute the character of his judges by a decree which is not, and cannot possibly be legal. By this means the boundaries at least, will be kept more distinct hetween ordinary law and extraordinary exertions of prerogative; and men will know that the national constitution is only suspended during a present and disficult emergence, by has not undergone a total and fundamental alteration.

" 1 State Trials, vol. v. p. 845, 255.

Notwithstanding these reasons, the prejudiced judges, four mexcepted, gave sentence in favour of the crown. Hambden, however, obtained by the trial the end for which he had so generously facrificed his fafety and his quiet: The people were roused from their leshargy, and became sensible of the danger to which their liberties were exposed. These national questions were canvassed in every company; and the more they were examined, the more evidently did it appear to many, that liberty was totally subverted, and an unusual and arbitrary authority exercised over the kingdom. Slavish principles, they faid, concur with illegal practices; ecclefiaftical tyranny gives aid to civil usurpation; iniquitous taxes are supported by arbitrary punishments; and all the privileges of the nation, transmitted through so many ages, secured by so many laws, and purchased by the blood of so many heroes and patriots, now lie prostrate at the feet of the mo-What though public peace and national industry increased the commerce and opulence of the kingdom? This advantage was temporary, and due alone, not to any encouragement given by the crown, but to the spirit of the English, the remains of their ancient freedom. What though the perm See State Trials: Article Ship-money, which contains the speeches of four judges in tayour of Hambden.

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

3637.

CHAP. fonal character of the king, amidst all his misguided counsels, might merit indulgence, or even praise? He was but one man; and the privileges of the people, the inheritance of millions, were too valuable to be facrificed to his prejudices and mistakes. Such, or more severe, were the sentiments promoted by a great party in the nation: No excuse on the king's part, or alleviation, I w reasonable soever, could be hearkened to or admitted: And to redrefs these grievances, a parliament was impatiently longed for; or any other incident, however calamitous, that might secure the people against those oppressions which they felt, or the greater ills which they apprehended from the combined encroachments of church and state.

CHAP. LIII.

Discontents in Scotland—Introduction of the canons and liturgy—A tumult at Edinburgh—The abolished — War — A pacification — Renewal of the war - Fourth English parliament -- Dissolution-Discontents in England-Rout at Newburn - Treaty at Rippon - Great council of the peers.

HE grievances under which the English la-CHAP. boured, when considered in themselves, without regard to the constitution, scarcely deserve the name; nor were they either burdensome on the people's properties, or any way shocking to the natural humanity of mankind. Even the imposition of ship-money, independent of the consequences, was a great and evident advantage to the public, by the judicious use which the king made of the money levied by that expedient. And though it was justly apprehended, that such precedents, if patiently submitted to, would end in a total disuse of parliaments, and in the establishment of arbitrary authority; Charles dreaded no opposition from the people, who are not commonly much affected with consequences, and require some striking motive to engage them in a resistance of established government. All ecclefiastical affairs were settled by law and uninterrupted precedent; and the church was become a confiderable barrier to the power, both legal and illegal, of the crown. Peace too, industry, commerce, opulence; nay, even justice and lenity off administration, notwithstanding some very sew exceptions: All these were enjoyed by the people; and every other blessing of government, except liberty, or rather CHAP. rather the present exercise of liberty and its proper fecurity. It feemed probable, therefore, that affairs might long have continued on the fame footing in England, had it not been for the neighbourhood of Scotland; a country more turbulent, and less disposed to submission, and obedience. It was thence the commotions first arose; and it is therefore time for us to return thither, and to give an account of the state of affairs in that kingdom.

Discon-Septland.

Though the pacific, and not unskilful government of James, and the great authority which he had acquired, had much allayed the feuds among the great iamilies, and had established law and order throughout the kingdom; the Scottish nobility were still possessed of the chief power and influence over the people. Their property was extensive; their hereditary jurisdictions and the feudal tenures increased their authority; and the attachment of the gentry to the heads of families established a kind of voluntary servitude, under the chiestains. Besides that long absence had much loosened the king's connexions with the nobility, who resided chiesly at their country-seats; they were in general at this time, though from slight causes, much disgusted with the court. Charles, from the natural piety or superstition of his temper, was extremely attached to the ecclesiastics: And as it is natural for men to persuade themselves that their interest coincides with their inclination; he had established it as a fixed maxim of policy, to increase the power and authority of that order. The prelates, he thought, established regularity and discipline among the clergy; the clergy inculcated obedience and loyalty among the people: And as that rank of men had no separate authority, and no dependence but on the crown; the royal power, it would feem, might with the greater sasety be entrusted in their hands. Many of the prelates, therefore, were raised to the chief CHAP. dignities of the state?: Spotswood, archbishop of LIII. St. Andrews, was created chancellor: Nine of the bishops were privy counsellors: The bishop of Ross aspired to the office of treasurer: Some of the prelates possessed places in the exchequer: And it was even endeavoured to revive the first institution of the college of justice, and to share equally between the clergy and laity the whole judicial authority q. These advantages, possessed by the church, and which the bishops did not always enjoy with fuitable modesty, disgusted the haughty nobility, who, deeming themselves much superior in rank and quality to this new order of men, were difpleased to find themselves inferior in power and influence. Interest joined itself to ambition, and begat a jealoufy, lest the episcopal sees, which, at the reformation, had been pillaged by the nobles, should again be enriched at the expence of that order. By a most useful and beneficial law, the impropriations had already been ravished from the great men: Competent salaries had been assigned to the impoverished clergy from the tithes of each parish: And what remained, the proprietor of the land was empowered to purchase at a low valuation. The king likewise, warranted by ancient law and practice, had declared for a genreal refumption of all crown-lands, alienated by his predecessors; and though he took no step towards the execution of this project, the very pretension to such power had excited jealoufy and discontent .

[·] Clarendon, p. 74, 75. May, p., 18. Warwick, p. 62.

NOTWITHSTANDING the tender regard which Charles bore to the whole church, he had been able, in Scotland, to acquire only the affection of the superior rank among the clergy. The ministers

Y

P Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 186 May, p. 29.

⁹ Guthry's Memoirs, p. 14. Rurnet's Mein. p. 29, 30.

King's Declaration, p. 7. Franklyn, p. 611.

^{*} King's Declaration, p. 6.

[.] Vol. VI.

CHAP. in general equalled, if not exceeded, the nobility, in their prejudices against the court, against the prelates, and against episcopal authority. Though the establishment of the hierarchy might seem advantageous to the inferior clergy, both as it erected dignities to which all of them might aspire, and as it bestowed a lustre on the whole body, and allured men of family into it; these views had no influence on the Scottish ecclesiastics. In the present disposition of men's minds, there was another circumstance which drew consideration, and counterbalanced power and riches, the usual foundations of distinction among men; and that was, the fervour of piety, and the rhetoric, however barbarous, of religious lectures and dis-Checked by the prelates in the licence of preaching, the clergy regarded episcopal jurisdiction both as tyranny and an usurpation, and maintained a parity among ecclesiastics to be a divine privilege, which no human law could alter or infringe. While fuch ideas prevailed, the most moderate exercise of authority would have given disgust; much more, that extensive power, which the king's indulgence encourged the prelates to assume. The jurisdiction of presbyteries, synods, and other democratical courts, was, in a manner, abolished by the bishops; and the general affembly itself had not been summoned for several years ". A new oath was arbitrarily imposed on intrants, by which they swore to observe the articles of Perth, and submit to the liturgy and canons. And in a word, the whole system of church government, during a course of thirty years, had been changed by means of the innovations introduced by James and Charles.

THE people, under the influence of the nobility and clergy, could not fail to partake of the difcontents which prevailed among these two orders; and where real grounds of complaint were wanting,

Burnet's Mem. p. 29, 30.

they greedily laid hold of imaginary ones. The CHAP. same borror against popery, with which the English puritans were possessed, was observable among the populace in Scotland; and among these, as being more uncultivated and uncivilized, feemed rather_ to be inflamed into a higher degree of ferocity. The genius of religion, which prevailed in the court and among the prelates, was of an opposite nature; and having some affinity to the Romish worship, led them to mollify, as much as possible, the severe -prejudices, and to speak of the catholics in more charitable language, and with more reconciling expressions., From this foundation, a panic fear of popery was easily raised; and every new ceremony or ornament, introduced into divine service, was part of that great mystery of iniquity, which, from the encouragement of the king and the bishops, was to overspread the nation". The few innovations, which James had made, was considered as preparatives to this grand design; and the farther alterations attempted by Charles were represented as a plain declaration of his intentions. Through the whole course of this reign, nothing had more fatal influence, in both kingdoms, than this groundless apprehension, which with so much industry was propagated, and with fo much credulity was embraced, by all ranks of men.

Amipst these dangerous complaints and terrors of religious innovation, the civil and ecclesiastical liberties of the nation were imagined, and with some reason, not to be altogether free from invasion.

THE establishment of the high commission by James without any authority of law, seemed a considerable encroachment of the crown, and erected the most dangerous and arbitrary of all courts, by a method equally dangerous and arbitrary. iteps towards the settlement of episcopacy had in-

CHAP deed been taken with consent of parliament: The articles of Perth were confirmed in 1621: In 1633, the king had obtained a general ratification of every ecclesiastical establishment: But these laws had less " authority with the nation, as they were known to have passed contrary to the sentiments even of those who voted for them, and were in reality extorted by the authority and importunity of the fovereign. The means, however, which both James and Charles had employed, in order to influence the parliament, were entirely regular; and no reasonable pretence had been afforded for representing these laws as null or invalid.

But there prevailed among the greater part of the nation another principles of the most important and most dangerous nature, and which, if admitted, destroyed entirely the validity of all such statutes. The ecclefiastical authority was supposed totally independent of the civil; and no aft of parliament, nothing but the consent of the church itself, was represented as sufficient ground for the introduction of any change in religious worship or discipline. And though James had obtained the vote of affemblies for receiving episcopacy and his new rites, it must be confessed that such irregularities had prevailed in constituting these ecclesiastical courts, and such violence in conducting them, that there were some grounds for denying the authority of all their acts. Charles, sensible that an extorted consent, attended with such invidious circumstances, would rather be prejudicial to his measures, had wholly laid aside the use of assemblies, and was resolved, in conjunction with the bishops, to govern the church by an authority, to which he thought himself fully entitled, and which he believed inherent in the crown.

THE king's great aim was to complete the work so happily begun by his father; to establish discipline upon a regular system of canons, to introduce a liturgy into public worship, and to render the ecclehaltical government of all his kingdoms regular and uniform.

uniform. Some views of policy might move him CHAP. to this undertaking: But his chief motives were derived from principles of zeal and conscience.

1637.

THE canons for establishing ecclesiastical juris- Introducdiction were promulgated in 1635; and were re-canons and coved by the nation, though without much appear-hangs, ing opposition, yet with great inward apprehension and discontent. Men felt displeasure at seeing the royal authority highly exalted by them, and repreinter as absolute and uncontrollable. They saw inest speculative principles reduced to practice, and a whole body of ecclesiastical laws established without any previous consent either of church or state x. They dreaded lest, by a parity of reason, like arbitrary authority, from like pretences and principles, would be assumed in civil matters: They remarked, that the delicate boundaries which separate church and state were already passed, and many civil ordinances established by the canons, under colour of ecclesiastical institutions: And they were apt to deride the negligence with which these important edicts had been compiled, when they found that the new liturgy or fervice-book was every where, under severe penalties, enjoined by them, though it had not yet been composed or published. It was, however, soon expected; and in the reception of it, as the people are always most affected by what is external and exposed to the senses, it was apprehended that the chief difficulty would confift,

THE liturgy which the king, from his own authority, imposed on Scotland, was copied from that of England: But lest a servile imitation might ihock the pride of his ancient kingdom, a few alrerations, in order to fave appearances, were made ,in it; and in that shape it was transmitted to the Clarendon, vol. i. p. 106. Y Idem, ibid. p. 105.

CHAP. bishops at Edinburgh z. But the Scots had universally entertained a notion, that though riches and worldly glory had been shared out to them with a sparing hand, they could boast of spiritual treafures more abundant and more genuine than were remjoyed by any nation under heaven. Even their southern neighbours, they thought, though separated from Rome, still retained a great tincture of the primitive pollution, and their liturgy was represented as a species of mass, though with some less show and embroidery. Great grajudices, therefore, were entertained against it, even confidered in itself; much more when regarded as a preparative, which was foon to introduce into Scotland all the abominations of popery. And as the very few alterations which distinguished the new liturgy from the English, seemed to approach nearer to the doctrine of the real presence; this circumilance was deemed an undoubted confirmation of every fuspicion with which the people were possessed b.

EASTER-DAY was, by proclamation, appointed for the first reading of the service in Edinburgh: But in order to judge more surely of men's dispositions, the council delayed the matter till the 23d of July; and they even gave notice, the Sunday before, of their intention to commence the use of the new liturgy. As no confiderable symptoms of discontent appeared, they thought that they might fafely proceed in their purpose; and accordingly, in the cathedral church of St. Giles, the dean of Edinburgh, arrayed in his furplice, began the fervice; the bishop himself and many of the privycouncil being present. But no sooner had the dean opened the book, than a multitude of the meanest fort, most of them women, clapping their hands, CHAR. cursing, and crying out, A pope! a pope! antichrift: stone him! raised such a tumult, that it was impossible to proceed with the service. The bishop, Tumult at mounting the pulpit, in order to appeale the burgh. populace, had a stool thrown at him: The council was insulted: And it was with difficulty that the magistrates were able, partly by authority, partly by force, to expel the rabble, and to shut the doors against them. The tumult, however, still co-naued without: Stones were thrown at the doors and windows: And when the service was ended, the bishop, going home, was attacked, and narrowly escaped from the hands of the enraged In the afternoon, the privy-seal, bemultitude. cause he carried the bishop in his coach, was so pelted with stones, and hooted at with execrations, and pressed upon by the eager populace, that, is this lervanic, with drawn swords, had not kept them off, the bishop's life had been exposed to the utmost danger d.

² King's Decl. p. 20. * King's Decl. p. 18. May, p. 32.

Burnet's Mem. p. 31. Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 396. May, p. 31. King's Deck. p. 22. Claiendon, vol. i. p. 108. Ruthworth, vol. ii. p. 387.

Though it was violently suspected, that the low populace, who alone appeared, had been instigated by some of higher condition, yet no proof of it could be produced; and every one spake with disapprobation of the licentiousness of the giddy multitude. It was not thought safe, however, to hazard a new insult by any new attempt to read the liturgy; and the people seemed, for the time, to be appealed and satisfied. But it being known that the king still persevered in his intentions of imposing that mode of worship, men fortified themselves still farther in their prejudices against it; and great multipless resorted to Edinburgh, in order to oppose the introduction of so hated a novelty. It was not long before they broke out in the most violent

d King's Decl. p. 23, 24, 25. Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 388.

King's Decl. p. 26. 30. Charendon, vol. i. p. 109.

King's Decl. p. 32. Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 400.

13 類

3 聚

28th Uct.

A P. disorder. The bishop of Galloway was attacked in the streets, and chased into the chamber where the privy-council was fitting. The council itself was besieged and violently attacked: The town-council meterith the same fate: And nothing could have -forced the lives of all of them, but their application to fome popular lords, who protected them, and dispersed the multitude. In this sedition, the actors were of some better condition. then in the former; though nobody of rank feemed, as yet, to conntest nance them 5.

ALL men, however, began to unite and to encourage each other, in opposition to the religious innovations introduced into the kingdom. Petitions to the council were figned and presented by persons of the highest quality: The women took part, and, as was usual, with violence: The clergy, every where, loudly declaimed against popery and the liturgy, which they represented as the same. The pulpits resounded with vehement invectives against antichrist: And the populace, who first opposed the service, was often compared to Balaam's als, an animal, in itself, stupid and senseless, but whose mouth had been opened by the Lord, to the admiration of the whole world h. In short, fanaticism mingling with faction, private interest with the spirit of liberty, fymptoms appeared, on all hands, of the most dangerous insurrection and disorder.

THE primate, a man of wisdom and prudence, wko was all along averse to the introduction of the liturgy, represented to the king the states of the nation: The earl of Traquaire, the treasurer, set out for London, in order to lay the matter more fully before him: Every circumstance, whether the cordition of England or of Scotland were considered, · should have engaged him to desist from so hazardous

King's Decl. p. 34, 36, &c. Rullworth, vol. ii. p. 404. h King's Decl. p. 31.

CHARLES 1.

an attempt: Yet was Charles inflexible. In his CHATA whole conduct of this affair, there appear no marks of the good sense with which he was endowed: A lively instance of that species of character so frequently to be met with; where there are found parts and judgment in every discourse and opinion; in many actions indifcretion and imprudence. views of things are the refult of their understanding alone: Their conduct is regulated by their under-

Handing, their temper, and their passions.

Sign that iolent a combination of a whole kingdom, Charles had nothing to oppose but a proclamation; in which he pardoned all past offences, and exhorted the people to be more obedient for the future, and to submit peaceably to the use of the liturgy. This proclamation was instantly encountered with a public protestation, presented by the earl of Hume an Lindsey: And this was the first time that men of quality had appeared in any violent act of opposition. But this proved a crisis. The insurrection, which had been advancing by a gradual and flow progress, now blazed up at once. disorder, however, attended it. On the contrary, a new order immediately took place. Four tables, as they were called, were formed in Edinburgh. One confisted of nobility, another of gentry, a third of ministers, a fourth of burgesses. The table of gentry was divided into many subordinate tables, according to their different counties. In the hands of the four tables, the whole authority of the kingdom was placed. Orders were issued by them, and every where obeyed, with the utmost regularity k. And among the first acts of their government was the production of the Covenant.

This famous covenant confifted first of a renun- The coveciation of popery, formerly figned by James in his nant.

1638. 19th Feb.

1637.

¹ King's Decl. p. 47, 48, &c. Guthry, p. 28. May, p. 37. A Clarendon, vol. i. p. 111. Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 734.

LIII. youth, and composed of many invectives, fitted to inflame the minds of men against their fellow-creatures, whom heaven has enjoined them to cheriff and to love. There followed a bond of union, by which the subscribers obliged themselves to resist religious ingovations, and to defend each other against all opposition whatsoever: And all this, for the greater glory of God, and the greater honour and advantage of their king and country ': The people, without distinction of rank or condition, of age or sex. flocked to the subscription of this coverant in their judgment, disapproved of it; and still lewer durst openly condemn it. The king's ministers and counsellors themselves were, most of them, feized by the general contagion. And none but rebels to God, and traitors to their country, it was thought, would withdraw themselves from so salutary and so pious a combination.

treacherous, the cruci,- he unreleming Philip, accompanied with all the terrors of a Spanish inquisition, was scarcely, during the preceding century, opposed in the Low Countries with more determined fury, than was now, by the Scots, the mild, the humane Charles, attended with his inoffenfive liturgy.

June.

THE king began to apprehend the consequences. He fent the marquis of Hamilton, as commissioner, with authority to treat with the covenanters. He required the covenant to be renounced and recalled: And he thought, that on his part he had made very fatisfactory concessions, when he offered to suspend the canons and the liturgy, till, in a fair and legal way, they could be received; and so to model the high commission, that it should no longer give offence to his subjects ". Such general declarations' could not well give content to any, much less to those who carried so much higher their pretensions. CHAP.

¹ King's Decl. p. 57, 58. Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 734. May, p. 38. " Rushworth, vol. 11. p. 754, &c.

The covenanters found themselves seconded by the zeal of the whole nation. Above fixty thousand people were assembled in a tumultuous manner in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood. Charles pofsessed no regular forces in either of his kinggoms. And the discontents in England, though lecret, were believed so violent, that the king, it was thought, would find it very difficult to employ in fucir a cause the power of that kingdom. The confidered their fituation, the less apprehension did they entertain of roval power, and the more rigoroully did they intile on entire fatisfaction. In anfwer to Manilton's demand of renouncing the covenant, they plainly told him, that they would sooner renounce their baptism. And the clergy invited the commissioner himself to subscribe it, by informing him, "With what peace and comfort it. " had filled the hearts of all God's people; what " resolutions and beginnings of reformation of " manners were fenfibly perceived in all parts of " the nation, above any measure they had ever be-" fore found or could have expected; how great " glory the Lord had received thereby; and what " confidence they had that God would make Scot-" land a bleffed kingdom "."

Hamilton returned to London: Made another fruitless, journey, with new concessions, to Edinburgh: Returned again to London; and was immediately sent back with still more satisfactory concessions. The king was now willing entirely to 17th Sept. abolish the canons, the liturgy, and the high com--million court. He was even resolved to limit extremely the power of the bishops, and was content if on any terms he could retain that order in the church of Scotland?. And to ensure all these gra-

King's Decl. p. 87. o Ibid. p. 22. Rushworth, vol. ii. P King's Decl. p. 137. Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 762.

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

LIII. first an assembly, then a parliament, where every first an assembly, then a parliament, where every national grievance might be redressed and remedied. These successive concessions of the king, which yes campatill short of the rising demands of the malcontents, discovered his own weakness, encouraged their infolence, and gave no fatisfaction. The offer, however, of an affembly and a parliament, in which they expected to be entirely-mafters, was willingly embraced by the covenanters. The

> CHARLES, perceiving what advantage his confident had reaped from their covenant, resolved to have a covenant on his fide; and he ordered one to be drawn up for that purpole. It confilted of the fame violent renunciation of popery above mentioned; which, though the king did not approve of it, he thought it fafelt to adopt, in order to remove all the suspicions entertained against him. As the dovenanters, in their bond of mutual defence against all opposition, had been careful not to except the king; Charles had formed a bond, which was annexed to this renunciation, and which expressed the duty and loyalty of the subscribers to his majesty 4. But the covenanters, perceiving that this new covenant was only meant to weaken and divide them, received it with the utmost scorn and detestation. And without delay they proceeded to model the future affembly, from which fuch great atchievements were expected '.

A general affembly.

THE genius of that religion which prevailed in Scotland; and which every day was fecretly gaining ground in England, was far from inculchting deference and submission to the ecclesiastics, merely as fuch: Or rather, by nourishing in every individual the highest raptures and ecstasies of devotion, it confecrated, in a manner, every individual, and, in his own eyes, bestowed a character on him, much superior to, what forms and ceremonious institutions CHA? could alone confer. The clergy of Scotland, though such tubicalt was excited about religious worship and discipline, were both poor and in small numbers; nor are they in general to be confidered, at least in the beginning, as the ringleaders of the fedicion, which was raifed on their account. On the contrary, the laity, apprehending from feveral instances which occurred, a spirit of moderation in that order, refelved to deshineer entirely in the assembly, which was Welmoned, and to hurry on the ecclefiastics by the same furious zeal with which they were themtelves transported .

⁴ King's Decl. p. 140, &c.

It had been usual, before the establishment of prefacy, for each presbytery to fend to the assembly, besides two or three ministers, one lay-commissioner'; and, as all the boroughs and universities less likewise commissioners, the lay-members in that ecclesiastical court nearly equalled the ecclesiaftics. Not only this institution, which James, apprehensive of zeal in the laity, had abolished, was now revived by the covenanters: They also introduced an innovation which ferved still farther to reduce the clergy to subjection. By an edict of the tables, whose authority was supreme, an elder from each parish was ordered to attend the presbytery, and to give his vote in the choice both of the commissioners and ministers who should be deputed to the affembly. As it is not usual for the ministers who and put in the lift of candidates, to claim a vote, all the elections by that means fell into the hands of the laity: The most furious of all ranks were chosen. And the more to overawe the clergy, a , new device was fallen upon, of chuling to every commif-

^{*} King's Decl. p. 188, 189. Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 761. t A presbytery in Scotland is an inferior ecclesiastical court, the same that was afterwards called a classis in England, and is com-, moted of the clergy of the neighbouring parishes to the number commonly of between twelve and twenty,

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

CHAP. commissioner, four or five lay-assessors, who, though they could have no vote, might yet interpole with 1638.

their advice and authority in the assembly.

THE affembly met at Glasgow: And, besides a great concourse of the people, all the nobility and gentity of any family or interest were present, either as members, assessors, or spectators; and it was apparent, that the resolutions taken by the covenanters, could here meet with no manner of oppo-A firm determination had been entered into of utterly abolishing episcopacy; and as a preparative to it, there was laid before the presbytery of Edinburgh, and folemnly read in all the churches of the kingdom, an accusation against the bishops, as guilty, all of them, of herefy, fimony, bribery, perjury, cheating, incest, adultery, fornication, common swearing, drunkenness, gaming, breach of the fabbath, and every other crime that had occurred to the accusers ". The bishops sent a protest, declining the authority of the assembly; the commissioner too protested against that court, as illegally constituted and elected; and, in his majesty's name, disfolved it. This measure was foreseen, and little regarded. The court still continued to sit, and to finish their business. All the acts of assembly since the accession of James to the crown of England were, upon pretty reasonable grounds, declared null The acts of parliament which affected and invalid. ecclesiastical affairs were supposed, on that very account, to have no manner of authority. And thus Episcopacy episcopacy, the high commission, the articles of Perth, the canons, and the liturgy, were abolished and declared unlawful: And the whole sebrict which James and Charles, in a long course of years, had been rearing with so much care and policy, fell at once to the ground. The covenant likewise was abolified.

3

总林

^{*} King's Decl. p. 190, 191. 292. Guthry, p. 39, &c. w King's Decl. p. 218. Rushworth, vol. ii. p. 787.

⁼ May, p. 44.

ordered to be figned by every one, under pain of CHAP.

Excommunication y.

1639-

THE independency of the ecclesiastical upon the · civil power was the old presbyterian principle, which had been zealously adopted at the reformation, and which, though James and Charles had obliged the church publicly to disclaim it, had secretly been adhered to by all ranks of people. It was commonly asked, whether Christ or the king were superior? And as the answer seemed obvious, it was inferred, that the affembly, being Christ's council, was superior in all spiritual matters to the parliament, which was only the king's. But as the covenanters were sensible that this consequence, though it seemed to them irrefragable, would not be assented to by the king; it became necessary to maintain their religious tenets by military force, and not to trustifestirely to supernatural assistance, of which, however, they held themselves well assured. They cast their eyes on all sides, abroad and at home. whence ever they could expect any aid or support.

league against Spain, and framed a treaty of partition, by which they were to conquer and to divide between them the Low Country provinces, England was invited to preserve a neutrality between the contending parties, while the French and Dutch should attack the maritime towns of Flanders. But the king replied to d'Estrades, the French ambassador, who opened the proposal, that he had a squadron ready, and would cross the seas, if necessary, with an army of 15,000 men, in order to prevent these projected conquests. This answer, which proves that Charles, though he expressed his mind with an imprudent candour, had at last acquired a just idea of national interest, irritated cardinal Richlieu; and in revenge, that politic and enterprising minister

y King's Decl. p. 317.,

⁼ Mem. d'Estrades, vol.

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

x639.

-- $36

HAP. carefully fomented the first commotions in Scotland, and fecretly supplied the covenanters with money and arms, in order to encourage them in their opposition against their sovereign.

Bur the chief resource of the Scottish malcontents was in themselves, and in their own vigour and abilities. No regular established commonwealth could take juster measures, or execute them with greater promptitude, than did this tumultuous combination, inflamed with bigotry for religious trifles, and faction without a reasonable object. The whole kingdom was in a manner engaged; and the men of greatest abilities soon acquired the ascendant, which their family interest enabled them to maintain. The earl of Argyle, though he long seemed • to temporise, had at last embraced the covenant; and he became the chief leader of that party: A man equally supple and inflexible, cautious and determined, and entirely qualified to make a ligure during a factious and turbulent period. The earls of Rothes, Cassils, Montrose, Lothian, the lords Lindesey, Loudon, Yester, Balmerino, distinguished themselves in that party. Many Scotch officers had acquired reputation in the German wars, particularly under Gustavus; and these were invited over to assist their country in her present necessity. The command was entrusted to Lesley, a soldier of experience and abilities. Forces were regularly inlisted and disciplined. Arms were commissioned and imported from foreign countries. A few castles which belonged to the king, being unprovided with victuals, ammunition, and garrisons, were soon And the whole country, except a small seized. part, where the marquis of Huntley fill adhered to the king, being in the hands of the covenanters, was in a very little time put in a tolerable posture of defence .

War.

CHARLES I.

THE fortifications of Leith were begun and car- CHAP: ried on with great rapidity. Besides the inferior fort, and those who laboured for pay, incredible numbers of volunteers, even noblemen and gentlemen, put their hand to the work, and deemed the most abject employment to be dignissed by the sanctity of the cause. Women too of rank and condition, forgetting the delicacy of their fex, and the decorum of their character, were intermingled with the lowest rabble; and carried on their shoulders the rubbish requisite for completing the fortisications .

WE must not omit another auxiliary of the covenanters, and no inconfiderable one; a prophetess, who was much followed and admired by all ranks of people. Her name was Michelson, a woman full of whimfies, partly hyfterical, partly religious; and inflamed with a zealous concern for the ecclefialtical discipline of the presbyterians. She spoke at certain times only, and had often interruptions of days and weeks: But when she began to renew her ecitacles, warning of the happy event was conveyed over the whole country, thousands crowded about her house, and every word which she-uttered was received with veneration, as the most sacred oracles. The covenant was her perpetual theme. The true, genuine covenant, the faid, was ratified in heaven: The king's covenant was an invention of Satan: When the spoke of Christ, she usually gave him the name of the covenanting Jesus. Rollo, a popular preacher, and zealous covenanter, was her preat favourite; and paid her, on his part, no less veneration. Being defired by the spectators to pray with her, and ipeak to her, he answered, "That he durst not, and that it would be ill manners in him to speak, " while his master, Christ, was speaking in her ""

Vol. VI.

CHARLES

1639.

1

d King's Declaration " Gurbry's Memoirs, p. 46. at large, p. 227. Burnet's Memoirs of Hamilton.

-4333

100

HAP. LIII.

CHARLES had agreed to reduce episcopal authority so much, that it would no longer have been of any service to support the crown; and this sacrifice of his own interests he was willing to make, in order to attain public peace and tranquillity. But he could not consent entirely to abolish an order, which he thought as essential to the being of a Christian church, as his Scottish subjects deemed it incompatible with that sacred institution. This narrowness of mind, if we would be impartial, we must either blame or excuse equally on both sides; and thereby anticipate, by a little restection, that judgment, which time, by introducing new subjects of controversy, will undoubtedly render quite samiliar to posterity.

So great was Charles's aversion to violent and sanguinary measures, and softrong his assection to his native kingdom, that it is probable the contest in his breast would be nearly equal between these laudable passions, and his attachment to the hierarchy. The latter affection, however, prevailed for the time, and made him haften those military preparations which he had projected for fubduing the refractory spirit of the Scottish nation. By regular œconomy, he had not only paid all the debts contracted during the Spanish and French wars, but had a suffed a fum of two hundred thousand pounds, which he referred for any fudden exigency. The queen had great interest with the catholics, both from the sympathy of religion, and from the favours and indulgences which she had been able to procure to them. She now employed her credit, and persuaded them, that it was reasonable to give large contributions as a mark of their duty to the king, during this urgent necessity. A considerable supply was obtained by this means; to the great scandal of the puritans, who were offended at seeing the king on such good terms with the papists, and CHAP. repined that others should give what they themselves were disposed to refuse him.

E Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 1329. Franklyn, p. 767.

CHARLES I.

1639.

CHARLES's fleet was formidable and well fup. plied. Having put 5000 land-forces on board, he entrusted it to the marquis of Hamilton, who had orders to fail to the Frith of Forth, and to cause a diversion in the forces of the malcontents. An army was levied of near 20,000 foot, and above 3000 horse, and was put under the command of the earl of Arundel, a nobleman of great family, but celebrated neither for military nor political abilities. The earl of Essex, a man of strict honour, and extremely popular, especially among the soldiery, was appointed lieutenant-general: The earl of Holland was general of the horse. The king himself joined the army; and he summoned all the 29th May, peers of England to attend him. The whole had the appearance of a splendid court, rather than of a military armament; and in this fituation, carrying more show than real force with it, the camp arrived at Berwic .

THE Scottish army was as numerous as that of the king, but inferior in cavalry. The officers had more reputation and experience; and the foldiers, though undisciplined and ill-armed, were animated as well by the national aversion to England, and the dread of becoming a province to their old enemy, as by an unfurmountable fervour of religion. pulpits had extremely affifted the officers in levying. recruits, and had thundered out anathemas against all those who went not out to affift the Lord against the mighty 8. Yet so pradent were the leaders of the malcontents, that they immediately fent fubmissive messages to the king, and craved to be admitted to a treaty.

f Clarendon, vol. i. p. 115, 116, 117.

⁸ Bucket's Memoirs of Hamilton.

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

CHAP. LIII.

1639.

CHARLES knew that the force of the covenanters was considerable, their spirits high, their zeal furious; and that, as they were not yet daunted by any ill success, no reasonable terms could be expected from them. With regard therefore to a treaty, great difficulties occurred on both fides. Should he fubmit to the pretentions of the malcontents, befides that the prelacy must be facrificed to their religious prejudices, such a check would be given to royal authority, which had, very lately, and with much difficulty, been thoroughly established in Scotland, that he must expect ever after to retain in that kingdom no more than the appearance of majefty. The great men, having proved, by so sensible a trial, the impotence of law and prerogative; would return to their former licentiousness: The preachers would retain their innate arrogance: And the people, unprotected by justice, would recognize no other authority than that which they found to domineer over them. England also, it was much to be feared, would imitate so bad an example; and having already a ftrong propensity towards republican and paritanical factions, would expect, by the fame feditious practices to string the fame indulgence. To advance to far, without bringing the rebels to a total fubmillion, at least to reasonable concessions, was to promise them, in all future time, an impunity for rebellion.

On the other hand, Charles confidered that Scotland was never before, under any of his anceftors, so united, and so animated it its own desence; yet had often been able to foil or clude the force of England, combined heartily in one cause, and enured by long practice to the use of arms. How much greater difficulty should be find at present, to subdue, by violence, a people instanced with religious prejudices; while he could only oppose to them a nation enervated by long peace, and lukewarm in his service; or, what was more to be dreaded,

I.

man

many of them engaged in the same party with the CHA'P. icbels h. Should the war be only protracted beyond a campaign, (and who could expect to finish it in that period?) his treasures would fail him; and for supply, he must have recourse to an English parliament, which by fatal experience he had ever found more ready to encroach on the prerogatives, than to supply the necessities of the crown. And what if he receive a defeat from the rebel army? This misfortune was far from being impossible. They were engaged in a national cause, and strongly actuated by mistaken principles. His army was retained entirely by pay, and looked on the quarrel with the fame indifference which naturally belongs to mercenary troops, without possessing the discipline by which fuch troops are commonly distinguillied. And the confequences of a defeat, while Scotland was enraged and England discontented, were so dreadful, that no motive should persuade him to hazard it.

In is evident that Charles had fallen into fuch a situation that, whichever side he embraced, his errors must be dangerous: No wonder, therefore, he was in great perplexity'. But he did worfe than embrace the worst side: For, properly speaking, he embraced no fide at all. He concluded a fudden pacification, in which it was stipulated, that he should withdraw his fleet and army; that within eight and forty hours the Scots should dismiss their forces; that the king's forts should be restored to him; his authority be acknowledged; and a general affembly and a parliament be immediately fummoned, in order to compose all differences i. What were the reasons which engaged the king to admit fuch strange articles of peace, it is in vain to inquire: For there scarcely could be any.

, Z 3

caufes

h Rush. vol.iii. p. 936.

i Ibid. p. 945.

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

CHAP. causes of that event may admit of a more gasy explication.

1639.

THE malcontents had been very induffrious in representing to the English the grievances under which Scotland laboured, and the ill counsels which had been fuggested to their sovereign. Their libertics, they said, were invaded: The prerogatives of the crown extended beyond all former precedent: Illegal courts erected: The hierarchy exalted at the expence of national privileges: And so many new superstitions introduced by the haughty tyrannical prelates, as begat a just suspicion that a project was feriously formed for the restoration of popery. The king's conduct, futely, in Scotland, had been in every thing, except in establishing the, ecclesiastical canons, more legal than in England; yet was there such a general resemblance in the complaints of both kingdoms, that the English readily affented to all the representations of the Scottish malcontents, and believed that nation to have been driven by oppression into the violent counsels which they had So far, therefore, from being willing embraced. to fecond the king in subduing the free spirits of the Scots; they rather pitied that unhappy people, who had been pushed to those extremities: And they thought that the example of fuch neighbours, as well as their affistance, might some time be advantageous to England, and encourage her to recover. by a vigorous effort, her violated laws and liberties. The gentry and nobility, who, without attachment to the court, without command in the army, attonded in great numbers the English camp, greedily seized, and propagated, and gave authority to their fentiments: A retreat, very little honourable, which the earl of Holland, with a confiderable detachment of the English forces, had made before a detachment of the Scottish, caused all these humours to blaze up at once: And the king, whose character was not sufficiently vigorous or decisive, and who CHAP. was apt, from facility, to embrace hasty counsels, fuddenly affented to a measure which was recommended by all about him, and which favoured his natural propension towards the misguided subjects of his native kingdom k.

CHARLES, having so far advanced in pacific meafures, ought with a steady resolution to have prolecuted them, and have submitted to every tolerable condition demanded by the affembly and parliament; nor should he have recommenced hostilities, but on account of such enormous and unexpected pretennions as would have justified his cause, if possible, to the whole English nation. So far, indeed, he adopted this plan, that he agreed not only to confirm his former concessions, of abrogating the canons, the liturgy, the high commission, and the articles of Perth; but also to abolish the order itself of bishops, for which he had so zealously contended'. But this concession was gained by the utmost violence which he could impose on his disposition and préjudices: He even secretly retained an intention of seizing favourable opportunities, in order to recover the ground which he had lost ". And one step farther he could not prevail with himself to advance. The affembly, when it met, paid no deference to the king's prepossessions, but gave full indulgence to their own. They voted episcopacy to Aug. 17th, be unlawful in the church of Scotland: He was willing to allow it contrary to the constitutions of the church. They stigmatised the liturgy and canons as popish: He agreed simply to abolish them. They denominated the high commission, tyranny: He was content to fet it aside ". The parliament, which fat after the affembly, advanced pretentions which tended to diminish the civil power of the k Clarendon, vol. i. p. 122, 123. May, p. 46.

LIII.

1639.

松養

¹ Ruth. vol. iii. p 946.

m Burnet's Memous, p. 154. Rush. vol. iii. p. 951.

[,] idem, ibid. p. 958, &c.

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

1639. War ienewed.

CHAP monarch; and, what probably affected Charles still more, they were proceeding to ratify the acts of affembly, when, by the king's instructione's, Traquaire, the commissioner, prorogued them. on account of these claims, which might have been forefeen, was the war renewed with great advantages on the fide of the covenanters, and disadvantages on that of the king.

> No sooner had Charles concluded the pacification without conditions, than the accessity of his assairs and his want of money obliged him to difband his army; and as the foldiers had been held together folely by mercenary views, it was not possible without great trouble, and expence, and loss of time, again to assemble them. The more prudent coyenanters had concluded, that their pretentions being so contrary to the interests, and still more to the inclinations of the king, it was likely that they should again be obliged to support their cause by arms; and they were therefore careful in difmissing their troops, to preferve nothing but the appearance of a pacific disposition. The officers had orders to be ready on the first summons: The soldiers were warned not to think the name fecure from an English invasion: And the regious zeal which animated all ranks of men, made them innuediately fly to their standards as foon, as the trumpet was founded by their spiritual and temporal leaders. The credit which in their last expedition they had acquired, by obliging their fovercign to depart from all his pretentions, gave courage to every one in undertaking this new enterprise P.

1640.

1 30

THE king, with great difficulty, founds means to Hpr. 13th draw together an army; but foon discovered, that all favings being gone, and great debts contracted, his revenue would be infussicient to support them. An English parliament, therefore, formerly so un-

Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 955.

P Cimendon, vol. i. p. 125. Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 1023.

kind and intractable, must now, after above eleven CHAP. years intermission, after the king had tried many irregular methods of taxation, after multiplied difgusts given to the puritanical party, be summoned 4th Engto assemble, amidst the most pressing necessities the crown.

1640 . e lish par-

As the king resolved to try, whether this house of commons would be more compliant than their predecessors, and grant him supply on any reasonable terms; the time appointed for the meeting of parliament was late, and very near the time allotted for opening the campaign against the Scots. After the past experience of their ill-humour, and of their incroaching disposition, he thought that he could not in prudence trust them with a long fession, till he had seen some better proofs of their good intentions: The urgency of the occasion, and the little time allowed for debate, were reasons which he referved against the malcontents in the house: And an incident had happened, which, he believed, had now furnished him, with still more cogent arguments.

THE earl of Traquaire had intercepted a letter written to the king of France by the Scottish malcontents; and had conveyed this letter to the king. Charles, partly repenting of the large concessions made to the Scots, partly difgusted at their fresh insolence and pretensions, seized this opportunity of breaking with them. He had thrown into the Tower lord Loudon, commissioner from the covenamers; one of the persons who had signed the treasonable letter 4. And he now laid the matter before the parliament, whom he hoped to inflame by the resentment, and alarm by the danger of this application to a foreign power. By the mouth of the lord keeper, Finch, he discovered his wants, and informed them that he had been able to affeinble his army, and to subsist them, not by any reve-

湖

Clarendon, vol. i. p. 129. Rush. vol. iii. p. 956. May, p. 56.

Lill. 2640.

HAP nue which he possessed, but by means of a large debt of above 300,000 pounds which he had contracted, and for which he had given fecusity upon the crown-lands. He represented, that it was necessary to grant supplies for the immediate and urgent deniands of his military armaments: That the feafon was far advanced, the time precious, and none of it must be lost in deliberation: That though his coffers were empty, they had not been exhausted by unnecessary pomp, or sumptuous buildings, or any other kind of magnificence: That whatever supplies had been levied on his subjects, had been employed for their advantage and prefervation, and like vapours rising out of the earth, and gathered into a cloud, had fallen in fweet and refreshing showers on the same fields from which they had at first been exhaled: That though he desired such immediate assistance as might prevent for the time a total disorder in the government, he was far from any intention of precluding them from their right to enquire into the state of the kingdom, and to offer him petitions for the redress of their grievances: That as much as was possible of this feason should afterwards be allowed them for that purpose a That as he expected only fuch supply at present as the current service necessarily required, it would be requifite to affemble them again next winter, when they should have full leisure to conclude whatever business had this session been left impersed and unfinished: That the parliament of Ircland had twice put such trust upon his good intentions, as to grant him, in the beginning of the fession, a large supply, and had ever experienced good effects from the confidence reposed in him: And that, in every circumstance, his people should find his conduct suitable to a just, pious, and gracious king, and such as was calculated to promote an entire harmony between prince and parliament.

^{*} Rush. vol. iii. p. 11'14.

LIII.

1640.

However plausible these topics, they made small CHAP. impression on the house of commons. By some illegal, and several suspicious measures of the crown, and by the courageous opposition which particular perfors, amidst dangers and hardships, had made to them; the minds of men, throughout the nation, had taken fuch a turn as to ascribe every honour to the refractory opposers of the king and the ministers. These were the only patriots, the only lovers of their country, the only heroes, and, perhaps too, the only true Christians. A reasonable compliance with the court was flavish dependence; a regard to the king, servile flattery; a considence in his promises, shameful prostitution. This general cast of thought, which has, more or less, prevailed in England, during near a century and a half, and which has been the cause of much good and much ill in public affairs, never predominated more than during the reign of Charles. The present house of commons, being entirely composed of country-gentlemen, who came into parliament with all their native prejudices about them, and whom the crown had no means of influencing, could not fail to contain a majority of these stubborn patriots.

Affairs likewise, by means of the Scottish infurrection, and the general discontents in England, were drawn to near to a criss, that the leaders of the house, sagacious and penetrating, began to forefee the consequences, and to hope, that the time, to long wished for, was now come, when royal authority must fall into a total subordination under popular assemblies, and when public liberty must acquire a full ascendant. By reducing the crown to necessities, they had hitherto found, that the king had been pushed into violent counsels, which had served extremely the purposes of his adversaries: And by multiplying these necessities, it was forescen that his prerogative, undermined on all sides, must, at last, be everthrown, and be no longer dangerous

CHAP. to the privileges of the people. Whatever, therefore, tended to compose the differences between king and parliament, and to preserve the government uniformly in its present channel, was zealously opposed by these popular leaders; and their past conduct and sufferings gave them credit sufficient to effect all their purposes.

THE house of commons, moved by these and many other obvious reasons, instead of taking notice of the king's complaints against his Scottish subjects, or his applications for supply, entered immediately upon grievances; and a speech, which Pym made them on that subject, was much more hearkened to, than that which the lord keeper had delivered to them in the name of their fovereign. The subject of Pym's harangue has been sufficiently explained above; where we gave an account of all the grievances, imaginary in the church, more real in the state, of which the nation, at that time, so loudly complained. The house began with examining the behaviour of the speaker the last day of the former parliament; when he refused, on account of the king's command, to put the question: And they declared it.a breach of privilege. They proceeded next to inquire into the imprisonment and profecution of fir John Elliot, Holles, and Valentine!: The affair of ship-money was canvassed: And plentiful subject of enquiry was suggested on all hands. Grievances were regularly classed under three heads; those with regard to privileges of parfiament, to the property of the subject, and to religion ". The king, feeing a large and inexhaustible field opened, preffed them again for supply; and finding his message inessectual, he came to the house of peers, and defired their good offices with the The peers were sensible of the king's commons. urgent necessities; and thought that supply, on this

" Idem, i bid. p. 1147. ! Rush. vol. iii. p. 1136.

⁸ Clarendon, vol. i. p. 433. Rush. vol. iii. p. 2131. May, p. 60.

1640.

go before grievances. They ventured to represent their sense of the matter to the commons; but their intercession did harm. The commons had always claimed, as their peculiar province, the granting of supplies; and, though the peers had here gone no farther than offering advice, the lower house immediately thought proper to vote fo unprecedented an interpolition to be a breach of privilege . Charles, in order to bring the matter of supply to some issue, folicited the house by new messages: And finding that ship-money gave great alarm and disgust; befides informing them, that he never intended to make a constant revenue of it, that all the money levied had been regularly, with other great fums, expended on equipping the navy; he now went for far as to offer them a total abolition of that obnoxious claim, by any law which the commons should think proper to present to him. In return, he only asked, for his necessities, a supply of twelve subfidies, about fix hundred thousand pounds, and that payable in three years; but, at the fame time, he let them know, that, confidering the fituation of his affairs, a delay would be equivalent to a denial *. The king, though the majority was against him, never had more friends in any house of commons; and the debate was carried on for two days, with great zeal and warmth on both fides.

Ir was urged by the partisans of the court, that the happiest occasion, which the fondest wishes could suggest, was now presented, for removing all disgusts and jealousies between king and people, and for reconciling their Tovereign, for ever, to the use of parliaments. That if they, on their part, laid aside all enormous claims and pretensions, and provided, in a reasonable manner, for the public neceslities; they needed entertain no suspicion of any in-

W Clarendon, vol. i. p. 134. Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 1154.

* Clatendon, vol. i. p. 135.

CHAP. satiable ambition or illegal usurpation in the crown. That though due regard had not always been paid, during this reign, to the rights of the people, yet no invasion of them had been altogether deliberate and voluntary; much less, the result of wanton tyranny and injustice; and still less, of a formed design to subvert the constitution. That to repose a reasonable confidence in the king, and generously to supply his present wants, which proceeded neither from prodigality nor misconduct, would be the true means of gaining on his generous nature, and extorting, by gentle violence, such concessions as were requisite for the establishment of public liberty. That he had promised, not only on the word of a prince, but also on that of a gentleman (the expression which he had been pleased to use), that, after the supply was granted, the parliament should still have liberty to continue their deliberations: Could it be suspected, that any man, any prince, much less such a one, whose words was, as yet, sacred and inviolate, would, for so small z motive, forfeit his honour, and, with it, all future trust and considence, by breaking a promise, so public and so solemn? That even, if the parliament should be deceived in reposing this considence in him, they neither lost any thing, nor incurred any danger; since it was evidently necessary, for the security of public peace, to supply him with money, in order to suppress the That he had so far suited his Scottish rebellion. first demands to their prejudices, that he only asked a supply for a few months, and was willing, after so short a trust from them, to fall again into dependence, and to trust them for his farther support and subsistence. That if he now seemed to desire something farther, he also made them, in return, a considerable offer, and was willing, for the suture, to depend on them for a revenue, which was quite necessary for public honour and security. That the nature of the English constitution supposed a mutual confidence between king and parliament: And CHAP. if they should refuse it on their part, especially with circumstances of such outrage and indignity; what could be expected but a total dissolution of government, and violent factions,' followed by the most dangerous convultions and intestine disorders?

In opposition to these arguments, it was urged by the malcontent party, that the court had discovered, on their part, but few fymptoms of that mutual confidence to which they now so kindly invited That eleven years intermission of the commons. parliaments, the longest that was to be found in the English annals, was a sufficient indication of the jealoufy entertained against the people; or rather of designs formed for the suppression of all their liberties and privileges. That the ministers might well plead necessity, nor could any thing, indeed, be a flronger proof of some invincible necessity, than their embracing a measure, for which they had conceived so violent an aversion, as the assembling of an English parliament. That this necessity, however, was purely ministerial, not national: And if the same grievances, ecclesiastical and civil, under which this nation itself laboured, had pushed the Scots to extremities; was it requisite that the English should forge their own chains, by imposing chains on their unhappy neighbours? That the ancient practice of parliament was to give grievances the precedency of supply; and this order, so carefully observed by their ancestors, was founded on a jealousy inherent in the constitution, and was never interpreted as any peculiar diffidence of the present lovereign. That a practice, which had been upheld, during times the most favourable to liberty, could not, in common prudence, be departed from, where such undeniable reasons for suspicion had been afforded. That it was ridiculous to plead the advanced season, and the urgent oscasion for supply; .When it plainly appeared, that, in order to afford a pretence

1640.

CHAP. pretence for this topic, and to seduce the commons, great political contrivance had been employed. That the writs for elections were issued early in the winter; and if the meeting of parliament had not purposely been delayed till so near the commencement of military operations, there had been leifure fufficient to have redressed all national grievances, and to have proceeded afterwards to an examination of the king's occasion for supply. That the intention of fo gross an artifice was to engage the commons, under pretence of necessity, to violate the regular order of parliament; and a precedent of that kind being once established, no inquiry into public meafures would afterwards be permitted: That scarcely any argument more unfavourable coulds be pleaded for supply, than an offer to abolish ship-money; a taxation the most illegal, and the most dangerous, that had ever, in any reign, been imposed upon the nation: And that, by bargaining for the remission of that duty, the commons would, in a manner, ratify the authority by which h had been levied; at least, give encouragement for advancing new pretensions of a like nature, in hopes of refigning them on like advantageous conditions.

THESE reasons, joined to so many occasions of ill humour, seemed to sway with the greater number: But; to make the matter worse, fir Harry Vane, the fecretary, told the commons, without any authority from the king, that nothing less than tivelve subfidies would be accepted as a compensation for the abolition of ship-money. This assertion, proceeding from the indiscretion, if we are not rather to call it the treachery, of Vane, displeased the house, by showing a stiffness and rigidity in the king, which, in a claim so ill grounded, was deemed inexcusable. We are informed likewife, that some men, who were thought to understand the state of the nation, affirmed in the house, that the amount of twelve CHA.P subsidies was a greater sum than could be found in all England. Such were the happy ignorance and inexperience of those times, with regard to taxes "!

1640.

THE king was in great doubt and perplexity. He faw, that his friends in the house were outnumbered by his enemies, and that the same counsels were still prevalent, which had ever bred fuch opposition and Instead of hoping that any supply disturbance. would be granted him, to carry on war against the Scots, whom the majority of the home regarded as their best friends and firmest allies; he expected every day, that they would present him an address for making peace with those rebels. And if the house met again, a vote, he was informed, would certainly pass, to blast his revenue of ship-money; and thereby renew all the opposition, which, with fo much difficulty, he had furmounted, in levying that taxation. Where great evils lie on all fides, it is difficult to follow the best counsel; nor is it any wonder, that the king, whose capacity was not equal to fituations of fuch extreme delicacy, thould haltily have formed and executed the resolution of Diffelia. dissolving this parliament: A measure, however, of tion. which he foon after repented, and which the fubsequent events, more than any convincing reason, inclined every one to condemn. The last parliament, which ended with fuch rigour and violence, had yet, at first, covered their intentions with greater appearance of moderation than this parliament had hitherto assumed.

An abrupt and violent dissolution naturally excites discontents among the people, who usually put entire considence in their representatives, and expect from them the redress of all grievances. As if there were not already fufficient grounds of complaint, the king persevered still in those counsels, which, from 2 Clarendon, vol. i. p. $36.

LIII. 1640.

CHAP. experience, he might have been sensible were so dangerous and unpopular. Bellasis and fir John Hotham were summoned before the council; and refusing to give any account of their conduct in parliament, were committed to prison. All the petitions and complaints, which had been fent to the committee of religion, were demanded from Crew, chairman of that committee, and on his refusal to deliver them, he was fent to the Tower. The studies, and even the pockets, of the earl of Warwic and lord Boke, before the expiration of privilege, were fearched, in expectation of finding treafonable papers. These acts of authority were interpreted, with some appearance of reason, to be invasions on the right of national assemblies b. But the king, after the first provocation which he met with, never fulliciently respected the privileges of parliament; and, by his example, he farther confirmed their resolution, when they should acquire power, to pay like difregard to the prerogatives of the crown.

Though the parliament was dissolved, the convocation was still allowed to sit; a practice of which, fince the reformation, there were but few instances, and which was for that reason supposed by many to be itregular. Besides granting to the king a fupply from the spirituality, and framing many canons, the convocation, jealous of like innovations with those which had taken place in Scotland, imposed an oath on the clergy, and the graduates in the universities, by which every one swore to maintain the established government of the church by archbishops, bishops, deans, chapters, &c. " These steps, in the present discontented humour of b Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 1167. May, p. 61.

There was one in 1586. See History of Archbishop Laud, p. 80. The authority of the convocation was indeed, in most respects, independent of the parliament, and there was no reason, which required the one to be dissolved upon the dissolution of the other.

the nation, were commonly deemed illegal; be-CHAP. cause not ratissed by consent of parliament, in whom all authority was now supposed to be centered. And nothing, befides, could afford more fubject of ridicule, than an oath, which contained an et catera in the midst of it.

1640.

THE people, who generally abhorred the convoca- Discontion as much as they revered the parliament, could England. scarcely be restrained from insulting and abusing this ailembly; and the king was obliged to give them guards, in order to protect them. An attack too was made during the night upon Laud, in his palace of Lambeth, by above 500 persons; and he found it necessary to fortify himself for his defence'. A multitude, confishing of two thousand sectaries, entered St. Paul's, where the high commission then fat; tore down the benches; and cried out, No liftop, no high commission: All these instances of discontent were presages of some great revolution; had the court possessed sufficient skill to discern the danger, or fufficient power to provide against it.

In this disposition of men's minds, it was in vain that the king issued a declaration, in order to convince his people of the necessity, which he lay under, of diffolving the last parliament h. The chief topic, on which he infifted, was, that the commons imitated the bad example of all their predecessors of late years, in making continual encroachments on his authority, in centuring his whole administration and conduct, in discussing every circumstance of public government, and in their indirect bargaining and contracting with their king for supply; as if nothing ought to be given him but what he should purchase, either by quitting somewhat of his royal prerogative, or by dominishing and lessening his Handing revenue. These practices, he said, were Whitlocke, p. 33. f Dugdale, p. 62. Ciarendon, vol. i. p. 143. h Rufanorth, vol. in, p. 1165. · Dugdare, p. 65.

CHAP. contrary to the maxims of their ancestors; and these practices were totally incompatible with monarchy i.

THE king, disappointed of parliamentary subsidies, was obliged to have recourse to other expedients, in order to supply, his urgent necessities. The ecclefiaftical fubfidies ferved him in fome flead; and it feemed but just, that the clergy should contribute to a war, which was in a great measure of their own raising k. He borrowed money from his ministers and courtiers; and so much was he beloved among them, that above 300,000 pounds were subscribed in a few days: Though nothing surely could be more disagreeable to a prince, full of dignity, than to be a burthen on his friends, instead of being a support to them. Some attempts were made towards forcing a loan from the citizens; but still repelled by the spirit of liberty, which was now become unconquerable! A loan of 40,000 pounds was extorted from the Spanish merchants, who had bullion in the Tower, exposed to the attempts of the king. Coat and conduct-money for the foldiery was levied on the counties; an ancient practice ", but supposed to be abolished by the petition of right. All the pepper was bought from the East India Company upon trust, and sold, at a great difcount, for ready money ". A scheme was proposed for coining two or three hundred thousand pounds of base money. Such were the extremities to which Charles was reduced, The fresh difficulties which, amidst the present distresses, were every day raised, with regard to the payment of ship-money, obliged him to exert continual acts of authority, augmented the discontents of the people, and increased his indigence and necessities P.

k May, p. 48i See note [Z] at the end of the volume. m Idem, vol. i. p. 168.

¹ Ruft. vol. iii. p. 2182. 9 Rush. vol. iii. p. 1216. May, p. 63 ⁿ May, p. 63.

P Rush, vol. iii, p. 1173. 1122. 1184. 1199. 1200. 1203, 1204.

THE present expedients, however, enabled the CHAP. king, though with great difficulty, to march his LIII. army, confilling of 19,000 foot, and 2000 horse 4. The earl of Northumberland was appointed general: The earl of Strafford, who was called over from Ireland, lieutenant-general: Lord Conway, general of the horfe. A finall fleet was thought fufficient to ferve the purposes of this expedition.

So great are the effects of zeal and unanimity, that the Scottish army, though somewhat superior, were fooner ready than the king's; and they march ed to the borders of England. To engage them to proceed, besides their general knowledge of the secret discontents of that kingdom, lord Saville had forged a letter, in the name of fix noblemen the most considerable of England, by which the Scots were invited to affift their neighbours, in procuring a redress of grievances. Notwithstanding these warlike preparations and hostile attempts, the covenanters still preserved the most pathetic and most fubmissive language; and entered England, they 20th Aug. faid, with no other view, than to obtain access to the king's prefence, and lay their humble petition at his royal feet. At Newburn upon Tyne, they were opposed by a detachment of 4500 men under Conway, who feemed resolute to dispute with them the passage of the river. The Scots first entreated them, with great civility, not to stop them in their march to their gracious fovereign; and then attacked them with great bravery, killed feveral, and chafed the rest from their ground. Such a panic seized the 28th Aug. whole English army, that the forces at Newcastle Rout at Newburn. fled immediately to Durham; and not yet thinking themselves sase, they deserted that town, and retreated into Yorkshire.

Rush. vol. iii. p. 1279. Clarendon, vol. i. p. 143.

^r Nalion, vol. ii. p. 427.

358

C H A P. LIII.

The Scots took possession of Newcastle; and though sufficiently elated with their victory, they preserved exact discipline, and persevered in their resolution of paying for every thing, in order still to maintain the appearance of an amicable correspondence with England. They also dispatched messengers to the king, who was arrived at York; and they took care, after the advantage which they had obtained, to redouble their expressions of loyalty, duty, and submission to his person, and they even made apologies, full of forrow and contrition, for their late victory.

CHARLES was in a very distressed condition. The nation was universally and highly discontented. The army was discouraged, and began likewise to be discontented, both from the contagion of general disgust, and as an excuse for their misbehaviour, which they were desirous of representing rather as want of will than of courage to fight. The treasury too was quite exhausted, and every expedient for supply had been tried to the atternioss. No event had happened, but what might have been foreseen as necessary, at least as very probable; yet such was the king's situation, that no provision could be made, nor was even any resolution taken against such an exigency.

Treaty at Ripj on.

No.

In order to prevent the advance of the Scots upon him, the king agreed to a treaty, and named fixteen English amblemen, who met with eleven Scottish commissioners as Rippon. The earls of Hertford, Bedfore. Salisbury, Warwic, Essex, Holland, Bristol, and Berkshire, the lords Kimbolton, Wharton, Dunsmore, Paget, Broke, Saville, Paulet, and Howard of Escric, were chosen by the king; all of them popular men, and consequently supposed nowise averse to the Scottish invasion, or unacceptable to that nation ".

¹ Rush. vol. ii. p. 1255.

Clarendon, vol. i. p. 155.

An address arrived from the city of London, pe-CHAP. titioning for a parliament; the great point to which all men's projects at this time tended ". Twelve noblemen presented a petition to the same purpose *. But the king contented himself with summoning a great council of the peers at York; a measure which had formerly been taken in cases of sudden emergency, but which, at prefent, could ferve to little purpose. Perhaps the king, who dreaded above all things the house of commons, and who expected no supply from them on any reasonable terms, thought that in his present distresses he might be enabled to levy supplies by the authority of the peers alone. But the employing so long the plea of a necessity which appeared distant and doubtful, rendered it impossible for him to avail himself of a necessity which was now at last become real, urgent, and incuitable.

By Northumberland's fickness the command of the army had devolved on Strafford. This nobleman pollessed more vigour of mind than the king or any of the council. He advised Charles rather to put all to hazard, than submit to such unworthy terms as were likely to be imposed upon him. The loss sustained at Newburn, he said, was inconsiderable; and though a panic had for the time feized the army, that event was nothing strange among new levied troops; and the Scots being in the same condition, would, no doubt, be liable, in their turn, to a like accident. His opinion therefore was, that the king should push forward, and attack the Scots, and bring the affair to a quick decision; and if he were so unsuccessful; nothing worse could befal him, than what, from his inactivity, he would certainly be exposed to '. To show how easy it would w Rush. vol. iii. p. 1263. * Clarendon, vol. i. p. 146. Rush. vol. iii. p. 1260. May, p. 66. Warwick, p. 151. Nalson, vol. ii. p. 5.

C II A P. be to execute this project, he ordered an affault to be made on some quarters of the Scots, and he gained an advantage over them. No cessation of arms had as yet been agreed to during the treaty at Rippon; yet great clamour prevailed, on account of this act of hostility. And when it was known that the officer who conducted the attack was a papist, a violent outcry was raised against the king, for employing that hated sect in the murder of his protestant subjects z.

IT may be worthy of remark, that feveral mutinies had arisen among the English troops, when marching to join the army; and some officers had been murdered, merely on suspicion of their being papists. The petition of right had abolished all martial law; and by an inconvenience which naturally attended the plan, as yet new and unformed, of regular and rigid liberty, it was found absolutely impossible for the generals to govern the army, by all the authority which the king could legally confer upon them. The lawyers had declared, that martial law could not be exercised, except in the very presence of an enemy; and because it had been found necessary to execute a mutineer, the generals thought it advisable, for their own fafety, to apply for a pardon from the crown. This weakness, however, was carefully concealed from the army; and lord Conway faid, that if any lawyer were so imprudent as to discover the secret to the soldiers, it would be necessary instantly to refute him, and to hang the lawyer himself by sentence of a court-martial b.

An army new levied, undisciplined, frightened, feditious, ill-paid, and governed by no proper authority, was very unfit for withstanding a victorious and high-spirited enemy, and retaining in subjection a discontented and zealous nation.

Z Clarendon, vol. i. p. 159. 1192, &c. May, p. 64.

² Rush. vol. iii. p. 1190, 1191, b Rusk. vol. iii. p. 1199-

CHARLES, in despair of being able to stem the CHAP: torrent, at last determined to yield to it: And as he LIII. forefaw that the great council of the peers would advise him to call a parliament, he told them in his 24th Sept. first speech, that he had already taken this resolution. council of He informed them likewise, that the queen, in a the peers. letter which she had written to him, had very earnestly recommended that measure. This good prince, who was extremely attached to his confort, and who passionately wished to render her popular in the nation, forgot not, amidst all his distress, the interests of his domestic tenderness.

In order to fubfift both armies (for the king was obliged, in order to fave the northern counties, to pay his enemies) Charles wrote to the city, desiring a loan of 200,000 pounds. And the peers at York, whose authority was now much greater than that of their fovereign, joined in the same request. So low was this prince already fallen in the eyes of his own subjects!

As many difficulties occurred in the negotiation. with the Scots, it was proposed to transfer the treaty from Rippon to London: A proposal willingly embraced by that nation, who were now fure of treating with advantage, in a place where the king, they foresaw, would be in a manner a prisoner, in the midst of his implacable enemies, and their determined friends .

Clarendon, vol. i. p. 154. Rush. vol. iii. p. 1275.

d Rush. vol. iii. p. 1279. ⁵ Ibid. p. 1305,

C HAP. LIV.

Meeting of the long parliament -- Strafford and Laud impeached -- Finch and Windebank fly-Great unthority of the commons - The bishops attacked -- Tonnage and poundage -- Triennut bill—Strafford's trial—Bill of attainder - Execution of Strafford - High commission and flar-chamber abolished -- King's journey to Scotland.

CHA 1640.

HA LIV. HE causes of disgust which, for above thirty years, had been daily multiplying in England, were now come to full maturity, and threatened the kingdom with some great revolution or comulfion. The uncertain and undefined limits of prerogative and privilege had been eagerly disputed during that whole period; and in every controversy between prince and people, the question, however doubtful, had always been decided by each party in favour of its own pretentions. Too lightly, perhaps, moved by the appearance of necessity, the king had even assumed powers incompatible with the principles of limited government, and had rendered it impossible for his most zealous partisans entirely to sustify his conduct, except by topics so unpopular, that they were more fitted, in the present disposition of men's minds, to inflame, than appeale, the general difcontent. Those great supports of public authority, law and religion, had likewise, by the unbounded compliance of judges and prelates, lost much of their influence over the people; or rather had in a great measure gone over to the side of faction, and authorifed unthorifed the spirit of opposition and rebellion. CHAP. The nobility, also, whom the king had no means of retaining by offices and preferments fuitable to their rank, had been seized with the general discontent, and unwardy threw themselves into the scale which already began too much to preponderate. Soutible of force encroachments which had been made by royal authority, men entertained no jeamay of the commons, whole enterprises for the acquifition of power had ever been covered with the appearance of public good, and had hitherto gone no farther then some ellappointed efforts and endeacours. The progreis of the Scottish malcontents reduced the crown to an entire dependence for supple: Their union with the popular party in England. brought great accession of authority to the latter: The near prospect of success roused all latent murmurs and pretentions which had hitherto been held in fuch violent constraint: And the torrent of geactar inclination and opinion ran fo ftrongly against the court, that the king was in no fituation to refuse any reasonable demands of the popular leaders, either for defining or limiting the powers of his preroga-Even many exorbitant claims, in his present fination, would probably be made, and mult necesfarily be complied with.

The triumph of the malcontents over the church was not yet so immediate or certain. Though the political and religious puritans mutually lent affiftance to each other, there were many who joined the former, yet declined all connexion with the latter. The hierarchy had been established in England ever fince the reformation: The Romish church, in all ages, had carefully maintained that form of ecclefinffical government: The ancient fathers too bore testimony to episcopal jurisdiction: And though parity may feem at first to have had place among Christian pastors, the period during which it pre-· vailed was so short, that few undisputed traces of it remained

CHAP, remained in history. The bishops and their more zealous partisans inferred thence the divine indefeizable right of prelacy: Others regarded that institution as venerable and useful: And if the love of novelty led fome to adopt the new rites and discipline of the puritans, the reverence to antiquity retained many in their attachment to the liturgy and government of the church. It behoved, therefore, the zealous innovators in parliament to proceed with fome caution and referve. By promoting all meafures which reduced the powers of the crown, they hoped to difarm the king, whom they justly regarded, from principle, inclination, and policy, to be the determined paron of the hierarchy. By declaiming against the supposed encroachments and tyranny of the prelates, they endcavoured to carry the nation from a hatred of their persons, to an opposition against their office and character. when men were inlifted in party, it would not be dissicult, they thought, to lead them by degrees into many measures, for which they formerly entertained the greatest aversion. Though the new sectaries composed not, at first, the majority of the nation, they were inflamed, as is usual among innovators, with extreme zeal for their opinions. Their unsurmountable passion, disguised to themselves, as well as to others, under the appearance of holy fervours, was well qualified to make profelytes, and to seize the minds of the ignorant multitude. And one furious enthusiast was able, by his active industry, to surmount the indolent efforts of many fober and reasonable antagonists.

WHEN the nation, therefore, was so generally discontented, and little suspicion was entertained of any defign to subvert the church and monarchy; no wonder that almost all elections ran in savour of those who, by their high pretensions to piety and patriotism, had encouraged the national prejudices. It is a usual compliment to regard the king's inclination in the choice of a speaker; and Charles CHAP. had intended to advance Gardiner, recorder of Liv. London, to that important trust: But so little interest did the crown at that time possess in the nation, that Gardiner was disappointed of his election, not only in London, but in every other place where it was attempted: And the king was obliged to make the choice of speaker fall on Lenthal, a lawyer of tome character, but not fufficiently qualified for fo high and difficult an office.

clination

THE cager expectations of men with regard to a Meeting of parliament, fummoned at so critical a juncture, and the long during fuch general discontents; a parliament which, Nov. 3. from the fituation of public allairs, could not be abruptly diffolved, and which was to execute every thing left unfinished by former parliaments; these motives, so important and interesting, engaged the attendance of all the members; and the house of commons was never observed to be, from the beginning, so full and numerous. Without any interval, therefore, they entered upon bufiness, and, by unaminious confent, they immediately struck a blow which may in a manner be regarded as decifive.

THE earl of Strafford was confidered as chief minister, both on account of the credit which he possessed with his master, and of his own great and uncommon vigour and capacity. By a concurrence of accidents, this man laboured under the fevere hatred of all the three nations which composed the British monarchy. The Scots, whose authority now ran extremely high, looked on him as the capital enemy of their country, and one whose counsels. and influence they had most reason to apprehend. He had engaged the parliament of Ireland to advance large subsidies, in order to support a war sminst them: He had levied an army of 9000 men,

CHAP with which he had menaced all their western coast: He had obliged the Scots, who lived under his go-1640. vernment, to renounce the covenant, their national idol: He had, in Ireland, proclaimed the Scottish coveramers rebels and traitors, even before the king had iffued any fuch declaration against them in England: And he had ever diffuaded his mafter agairdt the late treaty and suspension of arms, which he regarded as dangerous and dishonourable. avowed and violent were the Scots in their refent. ment of all these measures, that they had refused to find commissioners to treat at York, as was at first proposed: because, they said, the lieutenant of Iretand, their capital, enemy, being general of the king's forces, had there the chief command and ambority.

> STRAITOLD, first as deputy, then as lord lieutenant, had governed Ireland during eight years with great vigilance, activity, and prudence, but with very little popularity. In a nation fo averse to the English government and religion, these very virtues were sufficient to draw on him the public. hatred. The manners too and character of this great man, though to all full of courtefy, and to his friends full of affection, were, at bottom, haughty, rigid, and fevere. His authority and influence, during the time of his government, had been unlimited; but no somer did adversity seize him, than the concealed aversion of the nation blazed up at once, and the Irish parliament used every expedient to aggravate the charge against him.

THE universal discontent which prevailed in England against the court, was all pointed towards the earl of Strafford; though without any particular reason, but because he was the minister of state whore the king most favoured and most trusted. His extraction was henourable, his paternal fortune confiderable: Yet envy attended his fudden and great elevation. And his former affociates in popular

unlar counfels, finding that he owed his advance- CHAP. herr to the defertion of their cause, represented him as the great apostate of the commonwealth, whom it believed them to facrifice as a victim to public justice.

1640.

STRAFFORD, sensible of the load of popular prejudices under which he laboured, would gladly have declined attendance in parliament; and he begged me king's permission to withdraw himself to his government of Ircland, at least to remain at the head at the army in Yorkshire; where many opportunities, he hoped, would offer, by reason of his disrance, to clude the attacks of his enemies. Charles, who had entire confidence in the earl's capacity, thought that his counfels would be extremely felul during the critical fellion which approached. and when Strafford still infished on the danger of his appearing amidst so many enraged enclaies, the king; little apprehentive that his own authority was be addenly to expire, promifed him protection, and silured him, that not a hair of his head should be touched by the parliament.

No fooner was Strafford's arrival known, than a 11th Nov. rencerted attack was made upon him in the house of commons. Pym, in a long, studied discourse, divided into many heads after his manner, enumerated all the grievances under which the nation laboured; and, from a complication of fuch oppreftions, inferred, that a deliberate plan had been formed of changing entirely the frame of government, and subverting the ancient laws and libertics of the kingdom b. Could any thing, he faid, in-strafford crease our indignation against so enormous and cri-impeachminal a project, it would be to find, that, during ed. the reign of the best of princes, the constitution had been endangered by the worst of ministers, and That the virtues of the king had been seduced by

一种

關於

LIV.

3640.

CHAP. wicked and pernicious counsel. We must inquire, added he, from what fountain these waters of bitterness flow; and though doubtless many exil counsellors will be found to have contributed their endea vours, yet is there one who challenges the infamous pre-eminence, and who, by his courage, enterprife, and capacity, is entitled to the first place among these betrayers of their country. He is the carl of Strafford, lieutenant of Ireland, and president of the council of York, who in both places, and in all other provinces where he has been entrusted with authority, has raifed ample monuments of tyranny. and will appear, from a survey of his actions, to be the chief promoter of every arbitrary council. Some iinstances of imperious expressions, as well as actions, were given by Pym; who afterwards entered into a more personal attack of that minister, and endeavoured to expole his whole character and manners. The auftere genius of Strafford, occupied in the pursuits of ambition, had not rendered his break altogether inaccessible to the tender passions, or fecured him from the dominion of the fair; and in that fullen age, when the irregularities of pleasure were more reproachful than the most odious crimes, these weaknesses were thought worthy of being mentioned, together with his treasons, before so great an assembly. And, upon the whole, the orator concluded, that it belonged to the house to provide a remedy proportionable to the disease, and to prevent the farther mischiefs justly to be apprehended from the influence which this man had acquired over the measures and counsels of their sovereign 1.

Sir John Clotworthy, an Irish gentleman, sir John Hotham of Yorkshire, and many others, entered into the same topics: And, after several hours spent in bitter invective, when the doors were locked in order to prevent all discovery of their purpose; it was moved in consequence of the resolution secretly CHAP. taken, that Strafford should immediately be impeached of high treason. This motion was received with universal approbation; nor was there, in all the debate, one 'person that offered to stop the torrent by any testimony in favour of the earl's conduct. Lord Falkland alone, though known to be his enemy, modefily defired the house to consider whether it would not better fuit the gravity of their proceedings, first to digest by a committee many of those particulars which had been mentioned, before they fent up an accusation against him. It was ingeniously answered by Pym, that such a delay might probably blast all their hopes, and put it out of their power to proceed any farther in the profecution: That when Strafford should learn, that so many of his enormities were discovered, his conscience would dictate his condemnation; and so great was his power and credit, he would immediately procure the dissolution of the parliament, or attempt some other desperate measure for his own preservation: That the commons were only accusers, not judges; and it was the province of the peers to determine, whether such a complication of enormous crimes, in one person, did not amount to the highest crime known by the law k. Without farther debate, the impeachment was voted: Pym was chosen to carry it up to the lords: Most of the house accompanied him on so agreeable an errand: And Strafford, who had just entered the house of peers, and who little expected fo speedy a prosecution, was immediately, upon this general charge, ordered into custody, with several symptoms of violent prejudice in his judges, as well as in his prosecutors.

In the inquiry concerning grievances, and in the Laud imcensure of past measures, Laud could not long peached. escape the fevere scrutiny of the commons; who

W.

LIV. 1640.

CHAP. were led too, in their accusation of that prelate, as well by their prejudices against his whole order, as by the extreme antipathy which his intemperate zeal had drawn upon him. After a deliberation, which scarcely lasted half an hour, an impeachment of high treason was voted against this subject, the first, both in rank and in favour, throughout the kingdom-Though this incident, confidering the example of Strafford's impeachment, and the present disposition of the nation and parliament, 'needed be no furprife to him; yet was he betrayed into fome passion, when the acculation was presented. The commons themfelves, he said, though his accusers, did not believe him guilty of the crimes with which they charged him: An indifcretion which next day, upon more mature deliberation, he desired leave to retract; but so little favourable were the peers, that they refused him this advantage or indulgence. Laud also was immediately, upon this general charge, fequeflered from. parliament, and committed to cultody '.

> THE capital article insisted on against these two great men, was the defign which the commons sup-posed to have been formed, of subverting the laws and constitution of England, and introducing arbitrary and unlimited authority into the kingdom. Of all the king's ministers, no one was so obnoxious in this respect as the lord keeper Finch. He it was, who, being speaker in the king's third parliament, had left the chair, and refused to put the question, when ordered by the house. The extrajudicial opinion of the judges in the case of ship-money, had been procured by his intrigues, persuasions, and even menaces. In all unpopular and illegal measures, he was ever most active; and he was even believed to have declared publicly, that while he was keeper an order of council should always, with him, be equi-Rushworth, Whitlocke, p. 38. 1 Clarendon, vol. i. pe 177. Vol. iii. p. 1365.

CHARLES I.

relient to a law. To appeale the rifing displeasure CHAP LIV. the commons, he defired to be heard at their bar.

1640.

prostrated himself with all humility before them; but this fubmission availed him nothing. An impeachment was refolved on; and in order to escape their fury, he thought proper fecretly to withdraw, Lordkeepand retire into Holland. As he was not esteemed er Finch equal to Strafford, or even to Land, either in capacity or in fidelity to his mafter, it was generally believed that his escape had been counived at by the popular leaders. His impeachment, however, in his absence, was carried up to the house of peers.

Sir. Francis Windebank, the fecretary, was a creature of Laud's; a sufficient reason for his being extremely obnoxious to the commons. He was fecretly suspected too of the crime of popery; and it was known that, from complaifance to the queen, and indeed in compliance with the king's maxims of government, he had granted many indulgences to catholics, and had figured warrants for the pardon of priests, and their delivery from consinement. Grimstone, a popular member, called him, in the house, the very pander and broker to the whore of Babylon ". Finding that the scrutiny of the commons Secretary was pointed towards him, and being sensible that Winder England was no longer a place of fafety for men of his character, he suddenly made his escape into France .

Thus, in a few weeks, this house of commons, not opposed, or rather seconded by the peers, had produced fuch a revolution in the government, that the two most powerful and most favoured ministers of the king were thrown into the Tower, and daily expected to be tried for their life: Two other ministers had, by slight alone, faved themselves from

" Clarendon, vol. i. p. 178. Whitlocke, p. 37.

a like

m Clarendon, vol. i. p. 177. Whitlocke, p. 38. Rushworth, vol. 1. p. 129. 136. n Ruftworth, vol. v. p. 122.

LIV.

1640.

CHAP. a like fate: All the king's fervants faw that no protection could be given them by their master: A, new jurisdiction was creeted in the nation; and before that tribunal all those trembled, who had before exulted most in their credit and authority.

What rendered the power of the commons more formidable was, the extreme prindence with which it was conducted. Not content with the authority which they had acquired by attacking these great ministers, they were resolved to render the most confiderable bodies of the nation obnoxious to them. Though the idol of the people, they determined to fortify themselves likewise with terrors, and to overawe those who might still be inclined to support the falling ruins of monarchy.

Great authorny of the com

During the late military operations, feveral powers had been exercised by the lientenants and deputy-lieutenants of counties: And these powers, though necessary for the defence of the nation, and even warranted by all former precedent, yet not being authorited by statute, were now voted to be illegal; and the persons who had assumed them, declared delinquents. This term was newly come into vogue, and expressed a degree and species of guilt not exactly known or afcertained. In confequence of that determination, many of the nobility and prime gentry of the nation, while only exerting, as they justly thought, the legal powers of magistracy, unexpectedly found themselves involved in the crime of delinquency. And the commons reaped this multiplied advantage by their vote: They disarmed the crown; they established the maxims of rigid law and liberty; and they spread the terror of their own authority p.

· THE writs for ship-money had been directed to the sherists, who were required, and even obliged under severe penalties, to assess the sums upon individuals, and to levy them by their authority. Yet CHAP. were all the sherists, and all those who had been ______ employed in that illegal fervice, voted, by a very rigorous sentence, to be delinquents. The king, by the maxims of law, could do no wrong: His ministers and servants, of whatever degree, in case of any violation of the constitution, were alone culpable 4.

ALL the farmers and officers of the customs, who had been employed during so many years in levying tonnage and poundage, and the new impositions, were likewise declared criminals, and were afterwards glad to compound for a pardon by paying a fine of 150,000 pounds.

EVERY discretionary or arbitrary sentence of the star-chamber and high-commission courts, which, from their very constitution, were arbitrary, underwent a fevere scrutiny: And all those who had concurred in fuch fentences, were voted to be liable to the penalties of law. No minister of the king, no member of the council, but found himfelf exposed by this decision.

THE judges who had given their vote against Hambden, in the trial of ship-money, were accused before the peers, and obliged to find surety for their appearance. Berkley, a judge of the king's bench, was feized by order of the house, even when fitting in his tribunal; and all men faw with aftonishment the irresissible authority of their jurisdiction s.

THE fanction of the lords and commons, as well as that of the king, was declared necessary for the confirmation of ecclesiastical canons. And this judgment, it must be confessed, however reasonable, at least useful, it would have been dishcult to

⁹ Clarendon, vol. i. p. 176.

¹ Ibid. p. 177.

^{*} Whitlocke, p. 39.

^t Nalton, vol. i. p. 678.

1640.

CHAP. justify by any precedent ". But the present was no time for question or dispute. That decision which abolished all legislative power except that of parliament, was requifite for completing the new plan of liberty, and rendering it quite uniform and fyftematical. Almost all the bench of bishops, and the most considerable of the inferior clergy who had voted in the late convocation, found themselves exposed by these new principles to the imputation of delinquency w.

THE most unpopular of all Charles's measures, and the least justifiable, was the revival of monopolies, fo folemuly abolished, after reiterated endeavours, by a recent act of parliament. Sensible of this unhappy measure, the king had of himself recalled, during the time of his first expedition against Scotland, many of these oppressive patents; and the rest were now annuited by authority of parliament, and every one who was concerned in them declared delinquents. The commons carried fo far their detestation of this odious measure, that they affunied a power which had formerly been feldom practifed, and they expelled all their members who were monopolists or projectors: An artifice, by which, besides increasing their own privileges, they weakened still farther the very small party which the king fecretly retained in the house. Mildmay, a notorious monopolist, yet having associated himself

" Clarer don, vol. i. p. 206. Whitlocke, p. 37. Rush. vol. v.

p. 235, 359. Nalion, vol. 1. p. 807.

u An act of parliament, 25 Hen VIII. cap. 19. allowed the convocation, with the king's confent, to make carons. By the famous act of submission to that prince, the clergy bound themselves to enact no canons without the king's confent. The pirhament was never mentioned nor thought of. Such pretentions as the commons advanced at prefent would, in any former age, have been deemed flrange ului pations.

^{*} Lord Clarendon lays it was entirely new; but there are instances of it in the reign of Elizabeth. D'Ewes, p. 296. 352. There are also instances in the reign of James.

LIV.

1640.

with the ruling party, was still allowed to keep his CHAP. tent. In all questions indeed of elections, no stendy rule of decision was observed; and nothing farther was regarded than the affections and attachments of the parties y. Men's passions were too much heated to be shocked with any instance of injustice, which terved ends fo popular as those which were pursued by this house of commons.

THE whole fovereign power being thus, in a manner transferred to the commons, and the government, without any feeming violence or disorder, being changed in a moment from a monarchy almost absolute, to a pure democracy; the popular leaders feemed willing for some time to suspend their active vigour, and to confolidate their authoiny, ere they proceeded to any violent exercise of it. Every day produced some new harangue on past grievances. The detchation of former ulurpations, was farther enlivened: The jealoufy of liberty roused: And agreeably to the spirit of free government, no less indignation was excited by the view of a violated constitution, than by the ravages of the most enormous tyranny.

Thus was the time when genius and capacity of all kinds, freed from the restraint of authority, and nourished by unbounded hopes and projects, began to exert themselves, and be distinguished by the public. Then was celebrated the fagacity of Pym, more fitted for use than ornament; matured, not chilled, by his advanced age, and long experience: Then was displayed the mighty ambition of Hambden, taught difguile, not moderation, from former constraint; supported by courage, conducted by prodence, embellished by modelly; but whether founded in a love of power or zeal for liberty, is till, from his untimely end, left doubtful and uncertain: Then too were known the dark, ardent,

r Clarendon, ol. i. p. 176,

●髪に・ た

1640.

CHAP, and dangerous character of St. John; the impetuous spirit of Hollis, violent and sincere, open and entire in his enmities and in his friendskips; the enthusiastic genius of young Vane, extravagant in the ends which he pursued, sagacious and profound in the means which he employed; incited by the appearances of religion, negligent of the duties of morality.

So little apology would be received for past meafures, fo contagious the general spirit of discontent, that even men of the most moderate tempers, and the most attached to the church and monarchy, exerted themselves with the utmost vigour in the redress of grievances, and in profecuting the authors of them. The lively and animated Digby displayed his eloquence on this occasion, the firm and undaunted Capel, the modest and candid Palmer. In this list too of patriot royalists are found the virtuous names of Hyde and Falkland. Though in their ultimate views and intentions, these men differed widely from the former;

in their present actions and discourses, an entire concurrence and unanimity was observed.

By the daily harringues and invectives against illegal usurpations, not only the house of commons inflamed themselves with the highest animosity against the court: The nation caught new fire from the popular leaders, and seemed now to have made the first discovery of the many supposed disorders in the government. While the law in leveral instances feemed to be violated, they went no faither than some secret and calm murmurs; but, mounted up into rage and fury, as foon as the constitution was thought to be reitored to its former integrity and vigour. The capital, especially, being the seat of parliament, was highly animated with the spirit of mutiny and disaffection. Tumults were daily raised; seditious assemblies encouraged; and every man neglecting his own business was wholly intent on By stronger. the defence of liberty and religion. contagion, contagion, the popular affections were communi- CHAP. cated from breaft to breaft, in this place of general rendezwous and fociety.

1640.

THE harangues of members, now first published and dispersed, kept alive the discontents against the king's administration. The pulpits, delivered over to puritanical preachers and lecturers, whom the commons arbitrarily fettled in all the confiderable churches, resounded with faction and fanaticism. Vengeance was fully taken for the long filence and constraint, in which, by the authority of Laud and the high-commission, these preachers had been retained. The press, freed from all fear or reserve, Iwarnied with productions, dangerous by their feditious zeal and calumny, more than by any art or eloquence of composition. Noise and surv, cant and hypocrify, formed the fole rhetoric which, during this tumult of various prejudices and patlions, could be heard or actended to.

Till fentence which had been executed against Prynne, Bastwic, and Burton, now suffered a revisal from parliament. These libellers, far from being tarned by the rigorous punishments which they had undergone, showed still a disposition of repeating their offence; and the ministers were afraid lest new fatires should issue from their prisons, and still farther inflame the prevailing discontents. By an order, therefore, of council, they had been carried to remote prisons; Bastwic to Scilly, Prynne to Jersey, Burton to Guerniey; all access to them was denied; and the use of books, and of pen, ink, and paper, was refused them. The sentence for these additional punishments was immediately reversed in an arbitrary manner by the commons: Even the first fentence, upon examination, was declared illegal: And the judges who passed it were ordered to make reparation to the sufferers 2. When the prisoners

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

LIV.

1640.

CHAP, landed in England, they were received and enterrained with the highest demonstrations of affection, were attended by a mighty confluence of company, their charges were borne with great magnificence, and liberal presents bestowed on them. On their approach to any town, all the inhabitants crowded to receive them, and welcomed their reception with shouts and acclamations. Their train still increased, as they drew nigh to London. Some miles from the city, the zealots of their party met them in great multitudes, and attended their triumphant entrance: Boughs were carried in this tumultuous procession; the roads were strewed with slowers, and amidst the highest exultations of joy, were intermingled loud and virulent invectives against the prelates, who had so cruelly persecuted such godly personages a. The more ignoble these men were, the more fenfible was the infult upon royal authority, and the more dangerous was the spirit of difaffection and mutiny, which it discovered among the people.

> LILBURNE, Leighton, and every one that had been punished for leditious libels during the preceding administration, now recovered their liberty, and were decreed damages from the judges and ministers of justice b.

Nor only the present disposition of the nation enfured impunity to all libellers: A new method of framing and dispersing libels was invented by the leaders of popular discontent. Petitions to parliament were drawn, craving redress against particular grievances; and when a fullicient number of subscriptions were produced, the petitions were prefented to the commons, and immediately published. These petitions became secret bonds

² Clarendon, vol. i. p. 199, 200, &c. Nalson, vol. i. p. 570. May, p. So. b Rush. vol. v. p. 228. Nalson, vol. i. p. 800.

bonds of affociation among the subscribers, and CHA.P. teemed to give undoubted function and authority to the complaints which they contained.

1640.

Ir is pretended by historians favourable to the royal cause', and is even afferted by the king himfell in a declaration", that a most disingenuous or rather criminal practice prevailed, in conducting many of these addresses. A petition was first framed; moderate, reasonable, such as men of character willingly subscribed. The names were afterwards torn oil, and affixed to another petition, which served better the purposes of the popular faction. We may judge of the wild fury which prevailed throughout the nation, when so scandalous an imposture, which affected such numbers of people, cocld be openly practifed, without drawing infamy and ruin upon the managers.

So many grievances were offered both by the members, and by petitions without doors, that the house was divided into above forty committees, charged, each of them, with the examination of some particular violation of law and liberty, which had been complained of. Besides the general committees of religion, trade, privileges, laws; many subdivisions of these were framed, and a strict scruiny was every where carried on. It is to be remarked, that, before the beginning of this century, when the commons assumed less influence and authority, complaints of grievances were usually prefented to the house, by any members who had had particular opportunity of observing them. These general committees, which were a kind of inquisitorial courts, had not then been established; and we find that the king, in a former declaration e, complains d Husb. Col. p. 536. Dugdale. Clarendon, vol. i. p. 203. Published on dissolving the third parliament. See Farl. Hist. sol, viii. p. 347.

16.10.

解流

CHAP, loudly of this innovation, fo little favourable to LIV. royal authority. But never was so much multiplied as at prefent, the use of these committees; and the commons, though themselves the greatest innovators, employed the usual artifice of complaining against innovations, and pretended to recover the ancient and established government.

> From the reports of their committees, the house daily passed votes, which mortified and astonished the court, and inflamed and animated the nation. Ship-money was declared illegal and arbitrary; the fentence against Hambden cancelled; the court of York abolished; compositions for knighthood sligmatized; the enlargement of the forests condemned; patents for monopolics annulled; and every late measure of administration treated with reproach and obloquy. To-day, a fentence of the star-chamber was exclaimed against: To-morrow, a decree of the high-commission. Every discretionary act of council was represented as arbitrary and tyraunical; and the general inference was still incoleated, that a formed design had been laid to subvert the laws and constitution of the kingdom.

> From necessity, the king remained entirely pasfive during all these violent operations. The sew fervants, who continued faithful to him, were feized with allonishment at the rapid progress made by the commons in power and popularity, and were glad, by their unactive and inoffcnfive behaviour, to compound for impunity. The torrent rising to fo dreadful and unexpected a height, despair seized all those, who from interest or habit were most attached to monarchy. And as for those who maintained their duty to the king, merely from their regard to the constitution, they seemed by their concurrence to swell that inundation which began already to deluge every thing. "You have taken the whole machine of government in pieces," raid Charles in a discourse to the parliament; " a compactive frequent with skilful artists, when they desire to clear the wheels from any rust which may have grown upon them. The engine," continued he, " may again be restored to its former " use and motions, provided it be put up entire; " so as not a pin of it be wanting." But this was tar from the intention of the commons. The machine they thought, with some reason, was incumbered with many wheels and springs, which retarded and crossed its operations, and destroyed its utility. Thappy! had they proceeded with moderation, and been contented, in their present plenitude of power, to remove such parts only as night justly be deemed tapershuous and incongruous.

faid

In order to maintain that high authority which they had acquired, the commons, besides confounding and overawing their opponents, judged it requilite to inspire courage into their friends and adherents; particularly into the Scots, and the religious puritans, to whose affishance and good offices they were already fo much beholden.

No fooner were the Scots mallers of the northern counties, than they laid afide their first professions, which they had not indeed means to support, of paying for every thing; and in order to prevent the destructive expedient of plunder and free quarters, the country consented to give them a regular contribution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in full of their substitution of 850 pounds adday, in substitution f Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 1295.

E It appears that a subsidy was now fallen to 50,000 pounds

The state of

1640.

CHAP, were at first voted; and as the intention of this supply was to indemnify the members, who, by their private, had supported public credit, this pretence was immediately laid hold of, and the money was ordered to be paid, not into the treasury, but to commissioners appointed by parliament: A practice which, as it diminished the authority of the crown, was willingly embraced, and was afterwards continued by the commons, with regard to every branch of revenue which they granted to the king. The invalion of the Scots had evidently been the cause of affembling the parliament : presence of their army reduced the king to that total subjection in which he was now held "he common for this reason, openly protested their intention of retaining these invaders, till all their own enemies should be suppressed, and all their purposes effected. We cannot yet spare the Scots, said Strode plainly in the house; the sons of Zeruiah are still too strong for us h: An allusion to a passage of scripture, according to the mode of that age. Eighty thousand pounds a-month were requisite for the subsistence of the two armies; a sum much greater than the fubject had ever been accumstomed, in any former period, to pay to the public. And though feveral fubfidies, together with a poll-tax, were from time to time voted to answer the charge; the commons still took care to be in debt, in order to render the continuance of the selsion the more necessary.

THE Scots being such useful allies to the malcontent party in England, no wonder they were courted with the most unlimited complaisance and the most important services. The king having, in his first speech, called them rebels, observed that he had given great offence to the parliament; and he was immediately obliged to soften, and even retract the expression. The Scottish commissioners, of abome the most considerable were the earl of CHAP. Rothes and lord Loudon, found every advantage in conducting their treaty; yet made no haste in bringing it to an issue. They were lodged in the city, and Lept an intimate correspondence, as well with the magiltrates, who were extremely difaffected, as with the popular leaders in both houses. St. Antholine's church was affigued them for their devotions; and their chaplains, here, began openly to practife the preflyterian form of worthin, which, except in foreign languages, had never hitherto been allowed any indulgence or toleration. So violent was the general propenfity towards this new religion, that multitudes of all ranks crowded to the church. Those, who were so happy as to find access early in the morning, kept their places the whole day: Those, who were excluded, clung to the doors or windows, in hopes of catching, at leaft, force diffract marmar or broken phrases of the hely rheteric's All the eloquence of parliament, now well refined from pedantry, animated with the spirit of liberty, and employed in the most important integells, was not attended to with fuch infatiable avidity, as were these lectures, delivered with ridiculous cant, and a provincial accent, full of barbarism and of ignorance.

LIV.

1640.

THE most effectual expedient for paying court to the zealous Scots was to promote the profbyterian discipline and worship throughout England, and to this innovation the popular leaders among the commons, as well as their more devoted partifans, were, of themselves, sussiciently inclined. The puritanical party, whose progress, though secret, had hitherto been gradual in the kingdom, taking advantage of the present disorders, began openly to lyofels their tenets, and to make furious attacks on the established religion. The prevalence of that in the parliament discovered itself, from the be-

¹ Clarendon vol. i. p. 189.

CHAP. ginning, by insensible but decisive symptoms, LIV. Marshall and Burgess, two puritanical clergymen, were chosen to preach before them, and entertained them with discourses seven hours in length k. It being the custom of the house always to take the facrament before they emer upon butiness, they ordered, as a necessary preliminary, that the communion table should be removed from the east end of St. Margaret's into the middle of the area!. The name of the fpiritual lords was commonly left out in acts of parliament; and the laws ran in the name of king, lords, and commons. The clerk of the upper houf, in reading bills, turned his back on the bench of bishops; nor was his insolence ever taken notice of. On a day appointed for a folenm fast and humiliation, all the orders of temporal peers, contrary to former practice, in going to church, took place of the spiritual; and lord Spencer remarked, mat the humiliation, that day, feemed confined alone to the prelates.

The bi-Liops at. tacked.

EVERT meeting of the commons produced some vehement harangue against the usurpations of the bishops, against the high commission, against the late convecation, against the new canons. So disgusted were all lovers of civil liberty at the doctrines promoted by the clergy, that these invectives were received without control; and no distinction, at first, appeared between such as desired only to repress the exprbitances of the hierarchy, and such as pretended totally to annihilate episcopal jurisdiction. Encouraged by these favourable appearances, petitions against the church were framed in disserent parts of the kingdom. The epithet of the ignorant and vicious priesthood was commonly applied to all churchmen, addicted to the established discipline and worship; though the episcopal clergy in England, during that age, seem to have been, as they are at present, sufficiently learned and exem- CHAP. plary. An address against episcopacy was presented by twelve clergymen to the committee of religion, and pretended to be figned by many hundreds of the purifical persuasion. But what made most noise was, the city petition for a total alteration of church government; a petition to which 15,000 subscriptions were annexed, and which was presented by placemen Pennington, the city member . It is remurkable that, among the many ecclefialtical abuses there complained of, an allowance, given by the licenters of books, to publish a translation of Ovid's Art of Love, is not forgotten by these rustic centors ".*

1 Idem, ibid. p. 537 k Mallon, vol. i. p. 530. 534. they.

NOTWITHSTANDING the favourable disposition of the people, the leaders in the house resolved to proceed with caution. They introduced a bill for prohibiting all clergymen the exercise of any civil office. As a confequence, the bishops were to be de-'prived of their feats in the house of peers; a meature not unacceptable to the zealous friends of liberty; who observed with regret the devoted attachment of that order to the will of the monarch. But when this bill was presented to the peers, it was tejected by a great majority : The first check. career, and a prognostic of what they might afterwards expect from the upper house, whose inclinations and interests could never be totally separated from the throne. But, to shew how little they were discouraged, the puritans it mediately brought in another bill for the total abolition of epifcopacy; though they thought proper to let that bill fleep at present, in expectation of a more savourable opporunity of reviving it?

Clasendon, vol. i. p. 203. Whitlocke, p. 37. Nalson, vol. i. p. 566. • Charendon, vol. 1. n Rush. voltv. p. 171. 2 237. P Idem, ibid.

CHAP.

1640.

Among other acts of regal executive power, which the commons were every day assuming, they issued orders for demolishing all images, altars, crucifixes. The zealous sir Robert Harley, to whom the execution of these orders was committed, removed all crosses even out of streets and markets; and from his abhorrence of that superstitious sigure, would not any where allow one piece of wood or stone to lie over another at right angles.

The billiop of Ely and other clergymen were attacked on account of innovations. Cozens, who had long been obnexious, was exposed to new confures. This clergyman, who was dean of Peterborough, was extremely zealous for ecclesiastical ceremonies: And so far from permitting the communicants to break the sacramental bread with their singers, a privilege on which the puritans strenuously insisted, he would not so much as allow it to be cut with an ordinary household instrument. A confectated knife must perform that sacred office, and must never afterwards be profaned by any vulgar service.

Cozens likewise was accused of having said, The king has no more authority in ecclesiastical matters, than the boy who rubs my horses heels. The expression was violent: But it is certain, that all these high churchmen, who were so industrious in reducing the laity to submission, were extremely fond of their own privileges and independency, and were desirous of exempting the mitre from all subjection to the crown.

A commettee was elected by the lower house, as a court of inquisition upon the clergy, and was commonly denominated the committee of fcandalous ministers. The politicians among the commons were apprised of the great importance of the pulpit for guiding the people; the bigots were enraged CHAP. against the prelatical clergy; and both of them knew that no established government could be over-thrown by strictly observing the principles of justice, equity, or clemency. The proceedings, therefore, of this famous committee, which continued for several years, were cruel and arbitrary, and made great havoc both on the church and the universities. They began with harassing, imprisoning, and molesting the clergy; and ended with sequestrating and ejecting them. In order to join contumely to cruelty, they gave the fusierers the epithet of fcandalous, and endeavoured to render them as odious as they were miserable". The greatest vices, however, which they could reproach to a great part of them, were, bowing at the name of Jesus, placing the communion table in the east, reading the king's orders for sports on Sunday, and other practices, which the established government, both in church and state, had strictly enjoined them.

Parl, Hist. vol. vij. p. 282. Rushworth, vol. v. p. 351.

Parl, Hist. vol. vij. p. 282. Rushworth, vol. v. p. 209.

Ir may be worth observing, that all historians, who lived near that age, or what perhaps is more decifive, all authors who have cafually made mention of those public transactions, still represent the civil disorders and convulsions as proceeding from religious controversy, and consider the political disputes about power and liberty, as entirely subordinate to the other. It is true, had the king been able to support government, and at the same time 10 abstain from all invasion of national privileges, it seems not probable that the puritans ever could have acquired fuch authority as to overturn the whole constitution: Yet so entire was the subjection into which Charles was now fallen, that, had not the wound been poisoned by the infusion of theological hatred, it must have admitted of an easy remedy. Disuse of parliaments, imprisonments and

* Clarendon, vol. i. p. 199. Whitlocke, p. 122. May, p. 81.

C c 2 prosecution

CHAP. profecution of members, ship-money, an arbitrary administration; these were loudly complained of: But the grievances which tended chiefly to inflame the parliament and nation, especially the latter, were the furplice, the rails placed about the altar, the bows exacted on approaching it, the liturgy, the breach of the fabl ath, embroidered copes, lawn fleeves, the use of the ring in marriage, and of the cross in baptism. On account of these, were the popular leaders content to throw the government into such violent convulsions; and, to the disgrace of that age, and of this island, it must be acknowledged, that the disorders in Scotland entirely, and those in England mostly, proceeded from so mean and centemptible an origin ".

> Some perions, partial to the patriots of this age, have ventured to put them in balance with the mest illustrious characters of antiquity; and mentioned the names of Pyni, Hambden, Vanc, as a jult. parallel to those of Cato, Brutus, Cassius. Profound capacity, indeed, undaunted courage, extensive enterprite; in these particulars perhaps the Roman do not much furpals the English worthies: But what a difference, when the discourse, conduct, conversation, and private as well as public behaviour, of both are inspected! Compare only one circum. stance, and consider its consequences. The leisure of those noble ancients was totally employed in the study of Grecian eloquence and philosophy; in the cultivation of polite letters and civilized fociety: The whole discourse and language of the moderns were polluted with mysterious jargon, and full of the lowest and mest vulgar hypocrify.

a

THE

w Lord Clatendon, vol. i. p. 233. fays, that the parliamentary party were not agreed about the entire abolition of epitcopacy? They were only the root and branch men, as they were called, who infifted on that measure. But those who were willing to retain bishops, insided on reducing their authority to a low elib; as well as on abolishing the ceremonies of worship and vestments of the clergy. The controversy, then the parties was almost wholly theological, and that of the most frivolous and ridiculous kinds

THE laws, as they stood at present, protested the CHAP. church, but they exposed the catholics to the utmost rage of the puritans; and these unhappy religionists, so obnoxious to the prevailing sect, could not hope to remain long unmolested. The voluntary contribution which they had made, in order to affift the king in his war against the Scottish covenanters, was inquired into, and represented as the greatest enormity *. By an address from the commons, all officers of that religion were removed from the army, and application was made to the king for seizing two thirds of the lands of recusants; a proportion to which, by law, he was entitled, but which he had always allowed them to possess upon easy compositions. The execution of the severe and bloody laws against priests was insisted on: And one Goodman a jesuit, who was found in prison, was condemned to a capital punishment. Charles, however, agreeably to his usual principles, scrupled to. fign the warrant for his execution; and the commons expressed great resentment on the occasion . There remains a fingular petition of Goodman, begging to be hanged, rather than prove a source of contention between the king and his people 2. He escaped with his life; but it seems more probable that he was overlooked amidst affairs of greater consequence, than that such unrelenting hatred would. be softened by any consideration of his courage and generofity.

For some years, Con, a Scotchman, afterwards, Rosetti, an Italian, had openly resided at London, and frequented the court, as vested with a commisfion from the pope. . The queen's zeal, and her authority with her husband, had been the cause of ^{*} Rushworth, vel. v. p. 160.

y Idem, ibid. p. 158, 159. Nalson, vol. i. p. 739. Rushworth, vol. v. p. 166. Nalson, vol. i. p. 749.

the spirit of bigotry now rose too high to permit any longer such indulgences b.

HAYWARD, a justice of peace, having been wounded, when employed in the exercise of his office, by one James, a catholic madman, this enormity was ascribed to the popery, not to the phrenzy, of the affassin; and great alarms seized the nation and parliament. An universal conspiracy of the papists was supposed to have taken place; and every man, for some days, imagined that he had a sword at his throat. Though some persons of family and distinction were still attached to the catholic superstition, it is certain that the numbers of that sect did not amount to the fortieth part of the nation: And the frequent panies to which men, during this period, were so subject on account of the catholics, were less the effects of sear, than of extreme rage and avertion entertained against them.

The queen-mother of France, having been forced into banishment by some court-intrigues, had retired into England; and expected shelter, amidst her present distresses, in the dominions of her daughter and son-in-law. But though she behaved in the most inostensive manner, she was insulted by the populace on account of her religion; and was even threatened with worse treatment. The earl of Holland, lieutenant of Middlesex, had ordered a hundred musqueteers to guard her; but sinding that they had imbibed the same prejudices with the rest also an authorised agent who resided at Rome. His name was livet, and his chief business was to negotiate with the pope concerning indulgences to the catholics, and to engage the catholics, in return, to be good and loyal subjects. But this whole matter, though very innocent, was most carefully kept secret. The king says, that he herelieved Bret to be as much his as any papist could be. See p. 348, 354.

b Rushworth, vol. v. p. 301. Clarendon, vol. i. p. 249. Rushworth, vol. v. p. 57.

of their countrymen, and were unwillingly employed CHAP. in such a service, he laid the case before the house of peers; for the king's authority was now entirely annihilated. He represented the indignity of the action, that so great a princes, mother to the king of France, and to the queens of Spain and England, should be affronted by the multitude. He observed the indelible reproach which would fall spon the nation, if that unfortunate queen should tuiler any violence from the milmided zeal of the people. He urged the facred rights of hospitality due to every one, much more to a person in dithrefs, of fo high a rank, with whom the nation was fo nearly connected. The peers thought proper to communicate the matter to the commons, whose authority over the people was absolute. The commons agreed to the necessity of protecting the queen-mother; but at the same time prayed, that the might be defired to depart the kingdom: "For " the quieting those jealousies in the hearts of his " majerty's well-affected subjects, occasioned by " some ill instruments about that queen's person, by " the flowing of priests and papilts to her house, " and by the use and practice of the idolatry of the " mass, and exercise of other superstitious services " of the Romish church, to the great scandal of " true religion "."

CHARLES, in the former part of his reign, had endeavoured to overcome the intractable and encroaching spirit of the commons, by a perseverance in his own measures, by a stately dignity of behaviour, and by maintaining, at their utmost height, and even perhaps stretching beyond former precedent, the rights of his prerogative. Finding, by experience, how unsuccessful those measures had proved, and observing the low condition to which he was now reduced, he resolved to alter his whole Rushworth, and v. p. 257.

CHAP. conduct, and to regain the confidence of his people, by pliableness, by concessions, and by a total conformity to their inclinations and prejudices. It may fafely be averred, that this new extreme into which the king, for want of proper counsel or support, was fallen, became no less dangerous to the constitution, and permicious to public peace, than the other, in which he had fo long and fo unfortunately persevered.

Tonnage and poundage.

THE pretentions with regard to tonnage and poundage were revived, and with certain affurance of fuccess by the commons. The levying of these. duties, as formerly without confent of parliament, and even increasing them at pleasure, was such an incongruity in a free conflitution, where the people, by their fundamental privileges, cannot be taxed but by their own confent, as could no longer be endured by these jealous patrons of liberty. preamble therefore to the bill, by which the commons granted these duties to the king, they, took care, in the strongest and most positive terms, to alfert their own right of bestowing this gift, and to do vest the crown of all independent title of assuming it. And that they might increase, or rather finally fix, the entire dependence and fubjection of the king, they voted these duties only for two months,and afterwards, from time to time, renewed their grants for very fhort periods f. Charles, in order to show that he entertained no intention ever again to

It was an inflittelian given by the house to the committee which framed one of these bills, to take care that the rates upon exportation may be as light as possible; and upon importation, as heavy as trade will bear: a proof that the nature of commerce began now to be understood. Journ. 1 June 1641.

^{*} It appears not that the commons, though now entirely mallers, abolified the new impositions of James, against which they had for merly to loudly complained: A certain proof that the rates of cultoms, fettled by that prince, were in most instances just, and proportioned to the new price of commodities. They feem tather to have been low. See Jonin. 10th Aug. 1625.

separate himself from his parliament, passed this im- CHAP.

portant bill without any scruple or hesitation s.

With regard to the bill for triennial parliaments, 1640. he made a little difficulty. By an old statute, passed Triennial during the reign of Edward III. it had been enacted, that parliaments should be held once every year, or more frequently if necessary: But as no provision had been made in case of failure, and no precise method pointed out for execution; this statute had been confidered merely as a general declaration, and was dispensed with at pleasure. The defect was supplied by those vigilant patriots who now assumed the reins of government. It was enastad, that if the chancellor, who was first bound under severe penalties, failed to issue writs by the third of September in every third year, any twelve or more of the peers should be impowered to exert this authority: In default of the peers, that the flierisl's, mayors, bailists, &c. should summon the voters: And in their default, that the voters themselves should meet and proceed to the election of members, in the same manner as if writs had been regularly issued from the crown. Nor could the parliament, after it was affembled, be adjourned, prorogued, or dissolved, without their own consent, during the space of fifty days. By this bill, some of the noblest and most valuable prerogatives of the crown were retrenched; but at the same time nothing could be more necessary than such a statute, for completing a regular plan of law and liberty. A great reluctance to assemble parliaments must be expected in the king; where these assemblies, as of late, establish it as a maxim to carry their scrutiny into every part of government. During long in-termissions of parliament, grievances and abuses, as was found by recent experience, would naturally creep in; and it would even become necessary for Clarendon, vol. i. p. 203.

CHAP. the king and council to exert a great discretionary authority, and by acts of flate to supply, in every emergence, the legislative power, whose meeting was fo uncertain and precarious. Charles, finding that nothing less would satisfy his parliament and people, at last gave his affent to this bill, which produced so great an innovation in the constitution. Solemn thanks were presented him by both houses. Great rejoicings were expressed both in the city and throughout the nation. And mighty protessions were every where made of graticude and mutual returns of supply and considence. This concession of the king, it must be owned, was not entirely voluntary: It was of a nature too important to be voluntary. The fole inference which his partifans were entitled to draw from the submissions so frankly made to present necessity, was, that he kad certainly adopted a new plan of government, and for the future was, resolved, by every indulgence, to acquire the confidence and affections of his people.

> CHARLES thought, that what concessions were made to the public were of little confequence, if no gratifications were bestowed on individuals, who had acquired the direction of public counsels and determinations. A change of ministers as well as of meafures was therefore resolved on. In one day several new privy-counsellors were fworn; the earls of Hertford, Bedford, Essex, Bristol; the lord Say, 2 Saville, Kimbolton: Within a few days after was admitted the earl of Warwic '. All these noblemen were of the popular party; and some of them afterwards, when matters were pushed to extremities by the commons, proved the greatest support of monarchy.

Juxon, bishop of London, who had never defired the treasurer's staff, now earnestly solicited for La Clarendon, vol. i. p. 209. Whitlocke, p. 39. Rushworth, Clarendon, vol. i. p. 195. vol. v. p. 189.

LIV.

264

have to refign it, and retire to the care of that tur- CHAP. bulent diocese committed to him. The king gave his content; and it is remarkable, that during all the severe inquiries carried on against the conduct of ministers and prelates, the mild and prudent virtues of this man, who bore both thefe invidious characters, remained unmolefted . It was intended that Bedford, a popular man of great authority, as well as wisdom and moderation, should succeed Juxon: But that nobleman, unfortunately both for king and people, died about this very time. By some promotions, place was made for St. John, who was created solicitor-general. Hollis was to be made secretary of state, in the room of Windebank, who had fled: Pyin, chancellor of the exchequer, in the room of lord Cottington, who had refigned: Lord Say, master of the wards, in the room of the fame nobleman: The earl of Essex, governor; and Hambden, tutor to the prince !.

WHAT retarded the execution of these projected changes was, the difficulty of fatisfying all those who, from their activity and authority in parliament, had pretentions for offices, and who still had it in their power to embarrass and distress the public measures. Their affociates too in popularity, whom the king intended to distinguish by his favour, were unwilling to undergo the reproach of having driven a separate bargain, and of facrificing to their own ambitious views, the cause of the nation. And as they were fenfible that they must owe their preferment entirely to their weight and confideration in parliament, they were most of them resolved still to adheres to that affembly, and both to promote its authority, and to preserve their own credit in it. On all occasions, they had no other advice to give the king, than to allow himself to be directed by his great council; or in other words, to resign k Warwick, p. 95. Clarendon, vol. i. p. 210, 211.

¥640.

CHAP. himself passively to their guidance and government. And Charles found, that, instead of acquiring friends by the honours and offices which he should bestow, he should only arm his enemies with more power to hurt him.

The end on which the king was most intent in changing ministers was, to save the life of the earl of Strafford, and to mollify, by thefe indulgences, the rage of his most furious prosecutors. But so high was that nobleman's reputation for experience and capacity, that all the new counsellors and intended ministers plainly saw, that if he escaped their vengeance, he must return into favour and authority; and they regarded his death as the only fecurity which they could have, both for the establithment of their present power, and for success in their future enterprises. His, impeachment, therefore, was pushed on with the utmost vigour; and after long and folemn preparations was brought to a final iffue.

Strafford' trial.

*

IMMEDIATELY after Strafford was sequestered from parliament, and confined in the Tower, a committee of thirteen was chosen by the lower house, and entrusted with the office of preparing a charge against him. These, joined to a small committee of lords, were vested with authority to examine all witnesses, to call for every paper, and to use any means of scrutiny, with regard to any part of the earl's behaviour and conduct m. After so general and unbounded an inquisition, exercised by fuch powerful and implacable enemies, a man must have been very cautious or very innocent, not to afford, during the whole course of his life, some matter of accusation against him.

Tius committee, by direction from both houses, took an oath of secrecy; a practice very unusual, and which gave them the appearance of conspirators, more than ministers of justice". But the in- CHAP. tention of this strictness was, to render it more difficult for the earl to clude their fearch, or prepare 1640. for his justification.

Application was made to the king, that he would allow this committee to examine privy-counfellors with regard to opinions delivered at the board: A concession which Charles unwarily made, and which thenceforth banished all metual confidence from the deliberations of council; where every man is supposed to have entire freedom, without fear of future punishment or inquiry, of proposing any expedient, questioning any opinion, or supporting any argument,".

Sir George Ratcliffe, the earl's intimate friend and confident, was accused of high treatin, fent for from Ireland, and committed to close castody. no charge ever appeared or was profecuted against bim, it is impossible to give a more charitable interpretation to this measure, than that the commons thereby intended to deprive Strafford, in his prefent diffrefs, of the affiftance of his Lest hiend, who was most enabled, by his testimony, to justify the innocence of his patron's conduct and behaviour P.

When intelligence arrived in Ireland of the plans laid for Strafford's ruin, the Irish house of commons, though they had very lately bestowed ample praises on his administration, entered into all the violent councils against him, and prepared a representation of the miserable state into which, by his misconduct; they supposed the kingdom to be fallen. They fent over a committee to London, to affift in the profecution of their unfortunate governor; and by intimations from this committee, who entered into close confederacy with the popular leaders in England, was every measure of the Irish parlia-n Whitlocke, p 37. Idem, vol. i. p. 214.

[&]quot; Clare, don, vol. i. p. 191.

CHAP. ment governed and directed. Impeachments, which were never profecuted, were carried up against sir Richard Bolton, the chancellor, fir Gerard Louther, chief justice, and Bramhall, bishop of Derry This step, which was an exact counterpart to the proceedings in England, lerved also the same purposes: It deprived the king of the ministers whom he most trusted; it discouraged and terrified all the other ministers; and it prevented those persons who were best acquainted with Strasford's counsels from giving evidence in his favour before the English parliament.

1641.

THE bishops, being sorbidden by the ancient canons to affift in trials for life, and being unwilling, by any opposition, to irritate the commons, who were already much prejudiced against them, thought proper, of themselves, to withdraw'. The commons also voted, that the new-created peers ought to have no voice in this trial; because the acculation being agreed to while they were commoners, their confent to it was implied with that of all the commons of England. Notwithstanding this decifion, which was meant only to deprive Strafford of fo many friends, lord Seymour, and fome others, flill continued to keep their feat; nor was their right to it any farther questioned .

To bellow the greater folemnity on this important trial, scassolds were erected in Westminster-hall; where both houses fat, the one as accusers, the other as judges. Besides the chair of state, a close gallery was prepared for the king and queen, who attended during the whole trial'.

An accusation carried on, by the united effort of three kingdoms, against one man, unprotected by power, unaffifled by counfel, discountenanced by r Clarendon, vol. i. p. 216. 4 Rushworth, vol. v. p. 214. Whitlocke, p. 40. Rushworth, vol. iv. ⁵ Idem, ibid. p. 41. May, p. 90. authority, on mind, displayed by this magnanimous thatesman, that, while argument and reason and law had any place, he obtained an undisputed victory. And he perished at last, overwhelmed and still unsubdued, by the open violence of his sierce and unrelenting antagonitls.

The articles of impeachment against Strassord Mar. 22, are twenty-eight in number; and regard his conduct as president of the council of York, as deputy or licutenant of Ireland, and as counsellor or commander in England. But though four months were employed by the managers in framing the accusation, and all Strassord's answers were extemporary; it appears from comparison, not only that he was free from the crime of treason, of which there is not the least appearance, but that his conduct, making allowance for human infirmities, exposed to such severe serutiny, was innocent, and even laudable.

The powers of the northern council, while he was prefident, had been extended by the king's infiructions beyond what formerly had been practifed: But that court being at first instituted by a stretch of royal prerogative, it had been usual for the prince to vary his instructions; and the largest authority committed to it was altogether as legal as the most moderate and most limited. Nor was it reasonable to conclude, that Strassord had used any art to procure these extensive powers; since he never once sat as president, or exercised one act of jurisdiction, after he was invested with the authority so much complained of ".

In the government of Ireland, his administration had been equally promotive of his master's interests, and that of the subjects committed to his confiderable fum in the exchequer: The revenue, which never before answered the charges of government, was now raised to be equal to them w. A small standing army, somethy kept in no order, was augmented, and was governed by exact discipline. And a great force was there raised and paid, for the support of the king's authority against the Scottish covenanters.

海沙

INDUSTRY, and all the arts of peace, were introduced among that rude people: The shipping of the kingdom augmented a hundred fold. The customs tripled upon the same rates? The exports double in value to the imports: Manufactures, particularly that of linen, introduced and promoted. Agriculture, by means of the English and Scottish plantations, gradually advancing: The protestant religion encouraged, without the persecution or discontent of the catholics.

THE springs of authority he had enforced without overstraining them. Discretionary acts of jurisdiction, indeed, he had often exerted, by holding courts-multial, billeting foldiers, deciding causes upon paper-petitions before the council, issuing proclamations, and punishing their infraction. discretionary authority, during that age, was usually exercifed even in England. In Ireland, it was still more requilite, among a rude people, not yet theroughly subdued, averse to the religion and manners of their conquerors, ready on all occasions to relaple into rebellion and disorder. While the managers of the commons demanded, every moment, that the deputy's conduct should be examined by the line of rigid law and severe principles; he appealed still to the practice of all former deputies, and to the uncontrollable necessity of his fituation.

Warwick, p. 115.

W Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 120. 247. Warwick, p. 115.

^{*} Nalton, vol. ii. p. 45. Y Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 124.

So great was his art of managing elections and CHAP. balancing parties, that he had engaged the Irish parliament to vote whatever was necessary, both for the payment of former debts, and for support of the new-levied army; nor had he ever been reduced to the illega! expedients practifed in England, for the supply of public necessities. No imputation of rapacity could justly lie against his administration. Some instances of imperious expressions, and even actions, may be met with. The case of lord Mountnorris, of all those which were collected with so much industry, is the most flagrant and the least exculable.

IT. had been reported at the table of lord chancellor Lostus, that Annesley, one of the deputy's attendants, in moving a stool, had forely hurt his master's foot, who was at that time asslicted with the gout. Perhaps, said Mountnorris, who was present at table, it was done in revenge of that public affront, which my lord deputy formerly put upon him: But HE HAS A BROTHER, WHO WOULD NOT HAVE TAKEN SUCHOA REVENGE. This casual, and seemingly innocent, at least ambiguous, expression, was reported to Strafford, who, on pretence that such a suggestion might prompt Annesley to avenge himsels in another manner, ordered Mountnorris, who was an officer, to be tried by a court-martial for mutiny and sedition against his general. The court, which confifted of the chief officers of the army, found the crime to be capital, and condemned that nobleman to-lose his head ..

In vain did Strafford plead, in his own defence, against this article of impeachment, that the sentence of Mountnorris was the deed, and that too unanimous, of the court, not the act of the deputy; that he spake not to a member of the court, nor voted in the cause, but sat uncovered as a party, and then

N. Bull

Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 187.

'D d

CHAP immediately withdrew, to leave them to their free. dom; that, sensible of the iniquity of the sentence, he procured his majesty's free pardon to Mountnorris; and that he did not even keep that nobleman a moment in suspence with regard to his sate, but instantly told him, that he himself would sooner lose his right hand than execute such a sentence, nor was his lordship's life in any danger. In vain did Strafford's friends add, as a further apology, that Mountnorris was a man of an infamous character, who paid court, by the lowest adulation, to all deputies, while present; and blackened their charac-. ter, by the vilest calumnies, when recalled: And that Strassord, expecting like treatment, had used this expedient for no other purpose than to subduc the petulant spirit of the man. These excuses alleviate the guilt; but there still remains enough to prove, that the mind of the deputy, though great and firm, had been not a little debauched by the riot of absolute power and uncontrolled authority.

> WHEN Strafford was called over to England, he found every thing falling into such confusion, by the open rebellion of the Scots, and the secret discontents of the English, that, if he had counselled or executed any violent measure, he might perhaps have been able to apologise for his conduct, from the great law of necessity, which admits not, while the necessity is extreme, of any scruple, ceremony, or delay. But in fact, no illegal advice or action was proved against him; and the whole amount of his guilt, during this period, was some peevish, or at niost, imperious expressions, which, amidst such desperate extremities, and during a bad state of health, had unhappily fallen from him.

If Strafford's apology was, in the main, so satisfactory when he pleaded to each particular article of the charge, his victory was still more decisive when he brought the whole together, and repelled CHAP. the imputation of treason; the crime which the commons would infer from the full view of his conduct and behaviour. Of all species of guilt, the law of England had, with the most scrupulous exactness, defined that of treason; because on that lide it was found most necessary to protect the subject against the violence of the king and of his ministers. In the famous statute of Edward III. all the kinds of treason are enumerated, and every other crime, besides such as are there expressly mentioned, is carefully excluded from that appellation. But with regard to this guilt, An endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws, the statute of treasons is totally silent: And arbitrarily to introduce it into the fatal catalogue, is itself a subversion of all law; and, under colour of defending liberty, reverses a statute the best calculated for the security of liberty that had ever been enacted by an English parliament.

As this species of treason, discovered by the commons, is entirely new and unknown to the laws; so is the species of proof by which they pretend to fix that guilt upon the prisoner. They have invented a kind of accumulative or constructive evidence, by which many actions, either totally innocent in themselves, or criminal in a much inferior degree, shall, when united, amount to treason, and subject the person to the highest penalties inflicted by the law. A hasty and unguarded word, a rash and passionate action, assisted by the malevolent fancy of the accuser, and tortured by doubtful constructions, is transmuted into the deepest guilt; and the lives and fortunes of the whole nation, no longer protected by justice, are subjected to arbitrary will and pleasure.

"WHERE has this species of guilt lain so long " concealed?" faid Strafford in conclusion: "Where " has this fire been so long buried, during so many « centuries, Dd 2

LIV.

1641.

C.HAP. " centuries, that no smoke should appear till it " burst out at once, to consume me and my chil-' dren? Better it were to live under no law at all, " and, by the maxims of cautious prudence, to " conform ourselves, the best we can, to the arbi-"trary will of a master; than fancy we have a law " on which we can rely, and find at last, that this " law shall inslict a punishment precedent to the " promulgation, and try us by maxims unheard of " till the very moment of the profecution. If I fail " on the Thames, and split my vessel on an anchor; " in case there be no buoy to give warning, the " party shall pay me damages: But, if the anchor be marked out, then is the striking on it at my " own peril. Where is the mark fet upon this " crime? Where the token by which I should dis-" cover it? It has lain concealed, under water; " and no human prudence, no human innocence, " could fave me from the destruction with which I " am at present threatened.

" IT is now full two hundred and forty years " fince treasons were defined; and so long has it " been fince any man was touched to this extent, " upon this crime, before myself. We have lived, " my lords, happily to ourselves at home: We " have lived gloriously abroad to the world: Let " us be content with what our fathers have left us: "L'et not our ambition carry us to be more learned " than they were, in these killing and destructive Great wisdom it will be in your lordships, arts. " and just providence, for yourselves, for your " posterities, for the whole kingdom, to cast from you, into the fire, these bloody and mysterious " volumes of arbitrary and constructive treasons, as "the primitive christians did their books of curious arts, and betake yourselves to the plain let-" ter of the statute, which tells you where the crimc es is, and points out to you the path by which you " may avoid it.

"Let us not, to our own destruction, awake those sleeping lions, by rattling up a company of old records, which have lain for so many ages, by the wall, forgotten and neglected. To all my afflictions, add not this, my lords, the most severe of any; that I, for my other sins, not for my treasons, be the means of introducing a precedent so pernicious to the laws and liberties of my native country.

"However, these gentlemen at the bar say they speak for the commonwealth; and they believe so: Yet, under sayour, it is I who, in this particular, speak for the commonwealth. Precedents, like those which are endeavoured to be established against me, must draw along such inconveniencies and miseries, that, in a sew years, the kingdom will be in the condition expressed in a statute of Ilenry IV.; and no man shall know by what rule to govern his words and actions.

"IMPOSE not, my lords, difficulties infurmount"able upon ministers of state, nor disable them from
"ferving with cheerfulness their king and country.
"If you examine them, and under such severe pe"nalties, by every grain, by every little weight,
"the scrutiny will be intolerable. The public af"fairs of the kingdom must be left waste; and no
"wise man, who has any honour or fortune to lose,
"will ever engage himself in such dreadful, such
"unknown perils.

"My lords, I have now troubled your lordships "a great deal longer than I should have done. "Were it not for the interest of these pledges, "which a saint in heaven left me, I should be "loth"—Here he pointed to his children, and his weeping stopped him—"What I forfeit for my"self, it is nothing: But, I confess, that my in"discretion should forfeit for them, it wounds me "very deeply. You will be pleased to pardon my "infirmity to

CHAP. "infirmity: Something I should have said; but IIV." I see I shall not be able, and therefore I shall seave it.

"AND now, my lords, I thank God, I have been, by his bleffing, fufficiently instructed in the extreme vanity of all temporary enjoyments, compared to the importance of our eternal duration. And so, my lords, even so, with all humility, and with all tranquillity of mind, I submit, clearly and freely, to your judgments: And whether that righteous doom shall be to life or death, I shall repose myself, full of gratitude and considence, in the arms of the great Au"thor of my existence ""

CERTAINLY, fays Whitlocke d, with his usual candour, never any man acted fuch a part, on fuch a theatre, with more wisdom, constancy, and eloquence, with greater reason, judgment, and temper, and with a better grace in all his words and actions, than did this great and execulent person; and he moved the hearts of all his auditors, some fore excepted, to remorse and pity. It is remarkable, that the historian, who expresses himself in these terms, was himself chairman of that committee which conducted the impeachment against this unfortunace statesman. The accusation and defence lasted eighteen days. The managers divided the several articles among them, and attacked the prisoner with all the weight of authority, with all the vehemence of rhetoric, with all the accuracy of long preparation. Strafford was obliged to speak with deference and referve towards his most inveterate enemics, the commons, the Scottish nation, and the Irish parliament. He took only a very short time, on each article, to recollect himself: Yet he alone, without assistance, mixing modesty and humility with firmness and vigour, made such a defence, that the commons faw it impossible, by a legal prose- CHAP. cution, ever to obtain a sentence against him.

Bur the death of Strafford was too important a stroke of party to be left unattempted by any expedient, however extraordinary. Besides the great genius and authority of that minister, he had threatened fome of the popular leaders with an impeachment; and, had he not, himself, been suddenly prevented by the impeachment of the co amons, he hid, that very day, it was thought, charged Pym, Hambden, and others, with treason, for having invited the Scots to invade England. A bill of attainder was therefore brought into the lower house numediately after finishing these pleadings; and preparatory to it, a new proof of the earl's guilt was produced, in order to remove such scruples as might be entertained with regard to a method of proceeding fo unufual and irregular.

Sir Henry Vane, sccretary, had taken some notes of a debate in council, after the dissolution of the last parliament; and being at a distance, he had fent the keys of his cabinet, as was pretended, to his fon, fir Henry, in order to fearch for some papers, which were necessary for completing a marringe-settlement. Young Vane, falling upon this paper of notes, deemed the matter of the utmost importance; and immediately communicated it to Pym, who now produced the paper before the house of commons. The question before the council was: Offensive or defensive war with the Scots. The king proposes this difficulty, "But how can "I undertake offensive war, if I have no more "money?" The answer ascribed to Strafford was in these words: "Borrow of the city a hundred "thousand pounds: Go on vigorously to levy " ship-money. Your majesty having tried the af-"fections of your people, you are absolved and "loofe from all rules of government, and may do

Dd 4

"tried all ways, shall be acquitted before God and tried all ways, shall be acquitted before God and man. And you have an army in Ireland, which you may employ to reduce This kingdom to obedience: For I am confident the Scots cannot hold out five months." There followed some counsels of Laud and Cottington, equally violent, with regard to the king's being absolved from all rules of government.

This paper, with all the circumstances of its difcovery and communication, was pretended to be equivalent to two witnesses, and to be an unanswerable proof of those pernicious counsels of Strafford, which tended to the subversion of the laws and constitution. It was replied by Strafford and his friends, That old Vane was his most inveterate and declared enemy; and if the secretary himself, as was by far most probable, had willingly delivered to his son this paper of notes, to be communicated to Pym, this implied such a breach of oaths and of trust as rendered him totally unworthy of all credit; That the fecretary's deposition was at first exceedingly dubious: Upon two examinations, he could not remember any fuch words: Even the third time, his tellimony was not positive, but imported only that Strafford had spoken such or such-like words: And words may be very like in found, and differ much in sense; nor ought the lives of men to depend upon grammatical criticisms of any expressions, much less of those which had been delivered by the speaker without premeditation, and committed by the hearer for any time, however short, to the uncertain record of memory. That, in the prefent case, changing This kingdom into That kingdom, a very flight alteration! the earl's discourse could regard nothing but Scotland, and implies no advice

May, p. 93.

Clarendon, vol. i. p. 223. 229, 230, &c. Whillocke, p. 41.

unworthy

unworthy of an English counsellor. That even re- C H A P. taining the expression, This kingdom, the words may fairly be understood of Scotland, which alone was the kingdom that the debate regarded, and which alone had thrown off allegiance, and could be reduced to obedience. That it could be proved, as well by the evidence of all the king's ministers, as by the known disposition of the forces, that the intention never was to land the Irish army in England, but in Scotland. That of fix other counsellors prefent, Laud and Windebank could give no evidence; Northumberland, Hamilton, Cottington, and Juxon, could recollect no fuch expression; and the advice was too remarkable to be easily forgotten. That it was nowise probable such a desperate counsel would be openly delivered at the board, and before Northumberland, a person of that high rank, and whose attachments to the court were so much weaker than his connexions with the country. That though Northumberland, and he alone, had recollected fome such expression as that Of being absolved from rules of government, yet in such desperate extremities as those into which the king and kingdom were then fallen, a maxim of that nature, allowing it to be delivered by Strafford, may be defended upon principles the most favourable to law and liberty. And that nothing could be more iniquitous, than to extract an accusation of treason from an opinion simply proposed at the council-table, where all freedom of debate ought to be permitted, and where, it was not unufual for the members, in order to draw forth the sentiments of others, to propose counsels very remote from their own secret advice and judgment '.

THE evidence of fecretary Vane, though exposed Bill of to fuch unsurmountable objections, was the real cause of Strassord's unhappy fate; and made the bill of attainder pass the commons with no greater f Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 560.

opposition

CHAP. opposition than that of fifty-nine dissenting votes. But there remained two other branches of the legif. lature, the king and the lords, whose assent was requisite; and these, if left to their free judgment, it was easily forescen, would reject the bill without scruple or deliberation. To overcome this difficulty, the popular leaders employed expedients, for which they were beholden partly to their own industry, partly to the indiffretion of their adverfaries.

Next Sunday after the bill passed the commons, the puritanical pulpits resounded with declamations concerning the necessity of executing justice upon great delinquents ". The populace took the alarm. About fix thousand men, armed with swords and cudgels, flocked from the city, and furrounded the houses of parliament ". The names of the fifty-nine commoners who had voted against the bill of attainder were posted up under the title of Straffordians, and betrayers of their country. These were exposed to all the infults of the ungovernable multitude. When any of the lords passed, the cry for Justice against Strafford resounded in their ears: And such as were suspected of friendship to that obnoxious minister, were sure to meet with menaces, not unaccompanied with symptoms of the most desperate. resolutions in the furious populace'.

COMPLAINTS in the house of commons being made against these violences as the most slagrant breach of privilege, the ruling members, by their affected coolness and indifference, showed plainly that the popular tumults were not disagreeable to them k. But a new discovery, made about this time, ferved to throw every thing into still greater flame and combustion.

Some principal officers, Piercy, Jermyn, O'Neale, Goring, Wilmot, Pollard, Ashburnham, partly at-

* Whitlocke, ut supra.

.tached

h Idem, ibid. * Whitlocke, p. 43.

i Clarendon, vol. 1. p 232.253. · Rushworth, vol. v. p. 248. 1279.

tached to the court, partly disgusted with the par- CHAP. liament, had formed a plan of engaging into the LIV. king's fervice the English army, whom they ob- 1641. served to be displeased at some marks of preference given by the commons to the Scots. For this purpose they entered into an association, took an oath of fecrefy, and kept a close correspondence with some of the king's servants. The form of a petition to the king and parliament was concerted; and it was intended to get this petition subscribed by the army. The petitioners there represent the great and unexampled concessions made by the king for the fecurity of public peace and liberty; the endless demands of certain infatiable and turbulent spirits, whom nothing less will content than a total subverfion of the ancient constitution; the frequent tumults which these factious malcontents had excited, and which endangered the liberty of parliament. prevent these mischiefs, the army offered to come up and guard that affembly. "So shall the nation," as they express themselves in the conclusion, " not " only be vindicated from preceding innovations, " but be secured from the future, which are " threatened, and which are likely to produce more "dangerous effects than the former'." draught of this petition being conveyed to the king, he was prevailed on, somewhat imprudently, to counterfign it himself, as a mark of his approbation. But, as several difficulties occurred, the project was laid aside two months before any public discovery was made of it.

It was Goring who betrayed the secret to the popular leaders. The alarm may easily be imagined which this intelligence conveyed. Petitions from the military to the civil power are always looked on as disguised, or rather undisguised commands; and are of a nature widely different from petitions

¹ Clarendon, vol. is p. 247. Whitlocke, p. 43.

LIV.

1641.

146

CHAP. presented by any other rank of men. Pym opened the matter in the house m. On the first intimation of a discovery, Piercy concealed himself; and Jermyn withdrew beyond sea. This faither confirmed the fuspicion of a dangerous conspiracy. delivered his evidence before the nouse: Piercy wrote a letter to his brother Northumberland, confelling most of the particulars. Both their testimonies agree with regard to the oach of secresy; and as this circumstance had been denied by Pollard, Ashburnham, and Wilmot. in all their examinations, it was regarded as a new proof of some desperate resolutions which had been taken.

To convey more quickly the terror and indignation at this plot, the commons voted, that a protestation should be signed by all the members. It was fent up to the lords, and figned by all of them, except Southampton' and Robarts. Orders were given by the commons alone, without other authority, that it should be subscribed by the whole nation. The protestation was in itself very inoffensive, even infignificant; and contained nothing but general declarations, that the subscribers would defend their religion and liberties". But it tended to increase the popular panic, and intimated, what was more expressly declared in the preamble, that these blessings were now exposed to the utmost peril.

ALARMS were every day given of new conspiracies p: In Lancashire, great multitudes of papists were assembling: Secret meetings were held by them in caves and under-ground in Surrey: They had entered into a plot to blow up the river with gun-powder, in order to drown the city 9: Provifions of arms were making beyond sea: Sometimes France, sometimes Denmark, was forming designs

m Rushworth, vol. v. p. 240. n Idem, ibid. p. 255. · Clarendon, vol. 1. p. 252. Rufh. vol. v. p. 241. Warwick, P Dugdale, p. 69. Franklyn, p. 901. 9 Sir Edw. Walker, p. 349.

against the kingdom: And the populace, who are CHAP. always terrified with present, and en aged with distant dangers, were still farther animated in their demands of justice against the unfortunate Strafford.

LIV.

1641.

THE king came to the house of lords: And though he expressed his resolution, for which he offered them any fecurity, never again to employ Strafford in any branch of public bufiness, he professed himself totally distatisfied with regard to the circumstance of treason, and on that account declared his difficulty in giving his affent to the bill of attainder. The commons took fire, and voted it a breach of privilege for the king to take notice of any bill depending before the houses. Charles did not perceive that his attachment to Strafford was the chief motive for the bill; and that the greater proofs he gave of anxious concern for this minister, the more inevitable did he render his destruction.

Abour eighty peers had constantly attended Strafford's trial; but fuelt apprehensions were entertained on account of the popular tumults, that only forty-five were present when the bill of attainder was brought into the house. Yet of these, nineteen had the courage to vote against it . A certain proof that if entire freedom had been allowed, the bill had been rejected by a great majority.

In carrying up the bill to the lords, St. John, the folicitor-general, advanced two topics, well-fuited to the fury of the times; that though the testimony against Strafford were not clear, yet, in this way of bill, private fatisfaction to each man's conscience was sufficient, even should no evidence at all be produced; and that the earl had no title to plead law, because he had broken the law. It is true, added he, we give law to harcs and deer; for they are beafts of chase. But it was never accounted

s Whitlocke, p. 43. Rushworth, vol. v. p. 239. cither

CHAP. either cruel or unfair to destroy foxes or wolves wherever they can be found, for they are beasts of prey t.

AFTER popular violence had prevailed over the lords, the same battery was next applied to force the king's affent. The populace flocked about Whitehall, and accompanied their demand of justice with the loudest clamours and most open menaces. mours of conspiracies against the parliament were anew fpread abroad: Invalians and infurrections talked of: And the whole nation was raised into fuch a ferment as threatened some great and immi-On whichever fide the king cast nent convultion. his eyes, he saw no resource or security. All his fervants, confulting their own fafety, rather than their master's honour, declined interposing with their advice between him and his parliament. queen, terrified with the appearance of fo mighty a danger, and bearing formerly no good-will to Strafford, was in tears, and pressed him to satisfy his people in this demand, which, it was hoped, would finally content them. Juxon alone, whose courage was not inferior to his other virtues, ventured to advise him, if in his conscience he did not approve of the bill, by no means to affent to it ".

STRAFFORD, hearing of Charles's irrefolution and anxiety, took a very extraordinary step: He wrote a letter, in which he intreated the king, for the sake of public peace, to put an end to his unfortunate, however innocent, life, and to quiet the tumultuous people by granting them the request for which they were so importunate ". "In this," added he, "my "consent will more acquit you to God than all the world can do besides. To a willing man there is no injury. And as, by God's grace, I forgive all the world with a calmness and meekness, of t Clarendon, vol. i. 3. 232.

W Chaendon, vol. i. p. 258, c Rush. vol. v. p. 251.

" infinite contentment to my dislodging soul; so, CHAP. "Sir, to you I can resign the life of this world LIV. " with all imaginable cheerfulness, in the just " acknowledgment of your exceeding favours." Perhaps Strafford hoped that this unufual instance of generofity would engage the king still more stremoully to protect him: Perhaps he gave his life for loft; and finding himself in the hands of his enemies, and observing that Balfour, the lieutenant of the Tower, was devoted to the popular party', he absolutely despaired of ever escaping the multiplied dangers with which he was every way environed. We might ascribe this step to a noble effort of disinterestedness, not unworthy the great mind of Strafford, if the measure which he advised had not been, in the event, as permicious to his master as it was immediately fatal to himfelf ".

AFTER the most violent anxiety and doubt, Charles et last granted a commission to four poblemen to rive the royal assent, in his name, to the bill: Flattering himself, probably, in this extremity of distress, that, as neither his will consented to the deed, nor was his hand immediately engaged in it, he was the more free from all the guilt which attended it. These commissioners he empowered, at the same time, to give his affent to the bill which rendered the parliament perpetual.

THE commons, from policy, rather than necesity, had embraced the expedient of paying the two armies by borrowing money from the city; and these loans they had repaid afterwards by taxes levied upon the people. The citizens, either of themselves or by suggestion, began to start difficulties with regard to a farther loan which was demanded. We make no scruple of trusting the parliament, said they, were we certain that the parliament were to continue till our repayment. But, in the present precarious

^{*} Whitlocke, p. 44. Franklyn, p. 896.

For Note [AA] at the end of the volume.

CHAP. precarious situation of affairs, what security can be given us for our money? In pretence of obviating this objection, a bill was fuddenly brought, into the house, and passed with great unanimity and rapidity, that the parliament should not be dissolved, prorogued, or adjourned, without their own confent. It was hurried in like manner through the house of peers, and was instantly carried to the king for his assent. Charles, in the agony of grief, shame, and remorse, for Strafford's doom, perceived not that this other bill was of still more fatal consequence to his authority, and rendered the power of his enemies perpetual, as it was already uncontrollable z. In comparison of the bill of attainder, by which he deemed himself an accomplice in his friend's murder, this concession made no figure in his eyes 2: A circumstance which, if it lessen our idea of his resolution or penetration, serves to prove the integrity of his heart and the goodness of his disposition. It is indeed certain, that strong compunctions for his consent to Strafford's exceution attended this unfortunate prince during the remainder of his life; and even at his own fatal end, the memory of this guilt, with great forrow and remorfe, recurred upon him. All men were so sensible of the extreme violence which was done him, that he suffered the less both in character and interest from this unhappy measure; and though he abandoned his best friend, yet was he still able to preserve, in some degree, the attachment of all his adherents.

> Secretary Carleton was fent by the king to inform Strafford of the final resolution which necessity had extorted from him. The earl seemed surprised, and starting up, exclaimed, in the words of Scripture, Put not your trust in princes, nor in the sons of men: For in them there is no salvation b. He was b Whittocke, p. 44.

² Clarendon, vol. i p. 261, 262. Rushworth, vol. v. p. 264.

² See note [RB] at the end of the volume.

foon able, however, to collect his courage; and he CHA.P. prepared himself to suffer the fatal sentence. Only three days' interval was allowed him. The king, who made a new effort in his behalf, and fent, by the hands of the young prince, a letter addressed to the peers, in which he intreated them to confer with the commons about a mitigation of Strafford's sentence, and begged at least for some delay, was refused in both requests c.

1641.

STRAFFORD, in passing from his apartment to Execution Tower-hill, where the scaffold was erected, stopped of Strafford. under Laud's windows, with whom he had long lived in intimate friendship; and intreated the assistance of his prayers, in those awful moments which were approaching: The aged primate dissolved in tears; and having pronounced, with a broken voice; a tender blessing on his departing friend, sunk into the arms of his attendants. Strafford, still superior to his fate, moved on with an elated counte-. nance, and with an air even of greater dignity than what usually attended him. He wanted that consolation which commonly supports those who perish by the stroke of injustice and oppression.: He was not buoyed up by glory, nor by the affectionate compassion of the spectators. Yet his mind, erect and undaunted, found resources within itself, and maintained its unbroken resolution, amidst the terrors of death, and the triumphant exultations of his misguided enemies. His discourse on the scaffold was full of decency and courage. "He feared," he said, " that the omen was bad for the intended " reformation of the state, that it commenced with "the shedding of innocent blood." Having bid a last adieu to his brother and friends who attended him, and having fent a blessing to his nearer relations who were absent; " And now," said he, "I have nigh done! One stroke will make my wife a c Rush. vol. v. p. 265. d Nalan, vol. ii. p. 198.

E e " widow, Vol. VI.

LIV. "widow, my dear children fatherless, deprive my poor servants of their indulgent master, and sepa"rate me from my affectionate brother and all my friends! But let God be to you and them all in all!" Going to disrobe, and prepare himself for the block, "I thank God," said he, "that I am nowise afraid of death, nor an daunted with any terrors; but do as cheerfully lay down my head at this time, as ever I did when going to repose!"

With one blow was a period put to his life by the executioner.

Thus perished, in the 49th year of his age, the earl of Strafford, one of the most eminent personages that has appeared in England. Though his death was loudly demanded as a satisfaction to justice, and an atonement for the many violations of the constitution; it may safely be affirmed, that the fentence by which he fell, was an enormity greater than the worst of those which his implacable enemies profecuted with so much cruel industry... The people in their rage had totally mistaken the proper object of their resentment. All the necessities, or, more properly speaking, the difficulties by which the king had been induced to use violent expedients for raising supply, were the result of measures previous to Strafford's favour; and if they arose from ill conduct, he at least was entirely innocent. Even those violent expedients themselves, which occasioned the complaint that the constitution was subverted, had been, all of them, conducted, so far as appeared, without his counsel or affistance. And whatever his private advice might be, this falutary maxim he failed not, often and publicly, to inculcate in the king's presence, that, if any inevitable necessity ever obliged the sovereign to vio-

Rushworth, vol. v. p. 267.

That Strafford was secretly no enemy to arbitrary counsels, appears from some of his letters and dispatches, particularly vol. ii. p. 60. where he seems to wish that a standing army were established.

late the laws, this licence ought to be practifed with CHAP. extreme referve, and, as soon as possible, a just atonement be made to the constitution, for any injury which it might sustain, from such dangerous precedents 4. The first parliament after the restoration reversed the bill of attainder; and even a few weeks after Strafford's execution, this very parliament remitted to his children the more severe consequences of his sentence: As if conscious of the violence with which the profecution had been conducted.

In vain did Charles expect, as a return for fo many instances of unbounded compliance, that the parliament would at last show him some indulgence, and would cordially fall into that, unanimity, to which, at the expence of his own power, and of his friend's life, he so earnestly courted them. All his concessions were poisoned by their suspicion of his want of cordiality; and the supposed attempt to engage the army against them served with many as a confirmation of this jealousy. It was natural for the king to feek some resource, while all the world seemed to desert him, or combine against him; and this probably was the usmost of that em-. bryo-scheme which was formed with regard to the army. But the popular leaders still insisted, that a desperate plot was laid to bring up the forces immediately, and offer violence to the parliament: A defign of which Piercy's evidence acquits the king, and which the near neighbourhood of the Scottish army feems to render absolutely impracticable ",

⁸ Rushworth, vol. iv. p. 369, 568, 569, 570.

h The project of bringing up the army to London, according to Piercy, was proposed to the king; but he rejected it as soolish: Because the Scots, who were in arms, and lying in their neighbourhood, mult be at London as foon as the English army. This reason is so folid and convincing, that it leaves no room to doubt of the veracity of Piercy's evidence; and consequently acquits the king of this terrible plot of bringing up the army, which made tuch a noise at the time, and was a pretence for fo many violences.

AND THE PROPERTY OF THE PARTY.

LIV.

16.f1.

CHAP. By means, however, of these suspicions, was the fame implacable spirit still kept alive; and the commons, without giving the king any satisfaction in the fettlement of his revenue, proceeded to carry ' their inroads with great vigour into his now defenceless prerogative '.

High commillion and starchamber abolified.

THE two ruling passions of this parliament were, zeal for liberty, and an aversion to the church; and to both of these nothing could appear more exceptionable than the court of high commission, whose institution rendered it entirely arbitrary, and assigned to it the defence of the ecclesiastical esta-The star-chamber also was a court blishment. which, exerted high discretionary powers; and had no precise rule or limit, either with regard to the causes which came under its jurisdiction, or the decisions which it formed. A bill unanimously passed the houses to abolish these two courts; and in them to annihilate the principal and most dangerous articles of the king's prerogative. By the same bill, the jurisdiction of the council was regulated, and its authority abridged k. Charles hesitated before he gave his affent. But finding that he had gone too far to retreat, and that he possessed no resource in case of a rupture, he at last affixed the royal fanction to this excellent bill. But to show the para liament that he was sufficiently apprifed of the importance of his grant, he observed to them, that this statute altered in a great measure the fundamental laws, ecclefiaftical and civil, which many of his predecessors had established.

By removing the star-chamber, the king's power of binding the people by his proclamations was indirectly abolished; and that important branch of prerogative, the strong symbol of arbitrary power, and unintelligible in a limited constitution, being CHAP. at last removed, left the system of government more consistent and uniform. The star-chamber alone was accustomed to punish infractions of the king's edicts: But as no courts of judicature now remained, except those in Westminster-hall, which take cognizance only of common and statute law, the king may thenceforth issue proclamations, but no man is bound to obey them. It must, however, be confessed, that the experiment here made by the parliament, was not a little rash and adventurous. No government at that time appeared in the world, nor is perhaps to be found in the records of any history, which subsisted without the mixture of some arbitrary authority, committed to some magistrate; and it might reasonably, beforehand, appear doubtful, whether human society could ever reach that state of perfection, as to support itself with no other control than the general and rigid maxims of law and 'equity. But the parliament justly thought, that the king was too eminent a magistrate to be frusted with discretionary power, which he might so easily turn to the destruction of liberty. And in the event it has hitherto been found, that, though · some sensible inconveniences arise from the maxim of adhering strictly to law, yet the advantages overbalance them, and should render the English grateful to the memory of their ancestors, who, after repeated contests, at last established that noble though dangerous principle.

¹ Clarendon, vol. i. p. 266. k Idem, ibid. p. 283, 284. Whitlorke, p. 47. Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 1383, 1384. Rushworth, vol. v. p. 307.

Ar the request of the parliament, Charles, instead of the patents during pleasure, gave all the judges patents during their good behaviour. A circumstance of the greatest moment towards securing their independency, and barring the entrance of arbitrary power into the ordinary courts of judicature.

> m May, p. 107. • £ e 3

C H A P. LIV.

offensive words, and was not thought sufficiently limited by law, was also, for that reason, abolished. The stannary courts, which exercised jurisdiction over the miners, being liable to a like objection, underwent a like sate. The abolition of the council of the north and the council of Wales followed from the same principles. The authority of the clerk of the market, who had a general inspection over the weights and measures throughout the kingdom, was transferred to the mayors, sheritls, and ordinary magistrates.

In short, if we take a survey of the transactions of this "memorable parliament, during the first period of its operations, we shall find that, excepting Strafford's attainder, which was a complication of cruel iniquity, their merits in other respects so much outweigh their mistakes, as to entitle them to praise from all lovers of liberty. Not only were former abuscs remedied, and grievances redressed: Great provision, for the future, was made by law against the return of like complaints. And if the means by which they obtained fuch advantages savour osten of artifice, sometimes of violence; it is to be considered, that revolutions of government. cannot be effected by the mere force of argument and reasoning: And that factions, being once excited, men can neither so sirmly regulate the tempers of others, nor their own, as to ensure themselves against all exorbitances.

THE parliament now came to a pause. The king had promised his Scottish subjects, that he would this summer pay them a visit, in order to settle their government; and though the English parliament was very importunate with him, that he should lay aside that journey; they could not prevail with him so much as to delay it. As he must necessarily in his CHAP. journey have passed through the troops of both nations, the commons seem to have entertained great 1641. jealousy on that account, and to have now hurried 8th Aug. on, as much as they formerly delayed, the disband- journey to ing of the armies. The arrears therefore of the Scotland. Scots were fully paid them; and those of the English in part. The Scots returned home, and the English were separated into their several counties, and dismissed.

AFTER this the parliament adjourned to the 20th 9th Sept. of October; and a committee of both houses, a thing unprecedented, was appointed to fit during the receis with very ample powers. Pym was elected chairman of the committee of the lower house. Farther attempts were made by the parliament, while it fat, and even by the commons alone, for assuming sovereign executive powers, and publishing their ordinances, as they called them, instead of laws. The committee too, on their part, was ready to imitate the example.

A SMALL committee of both houses was appointed to attend the king into Scotland, in order, as was pretended, to see that the articles of pacification were executed; but really to be spies upon him, and extend still farther the ideas of parliamentary authority, as well as eclipse the majesty of the king. The earl of Bedford, lord Howard, fir Philip Stapleton, sir William Armyne, Fiennes, and Hambden, were the persons chosen?.

ENDEAVOURS were used, before Charles's departure, to have a protector of the kingdom appointed, with a power to pass laws without having recourse to the king. So little regard was now paid to royal authority, or to the established constitution of the kingdom.

Rushworth, vol. v. p. 387.
 F Ibid. p. 376.

CHAP. Amids the great variety of affairs which occurred during this bufy period, we have almost overlooked the marriage of the princess Mary with William prince of Orange. The king concluded not this alliance without communicating his intentions to the parliament, who received the proposal with satisfaction q. This was the commencement of the connections with the family of Orange: Connections, which were afterwards attended with the most important consequences, both to the kingdom and to the house of Stuart.

9 Whitlocke, p. 38.

CHAP. LV.

Settlement of Scotland —— Conspiracy in Ireland —— Infurrection and maffacre—Meeting of the English parliament—The remonstrance—Reasons on both sides -- Inspeachment of the bisineps --Accufation of the five members—Trimults— . King leaves London - Arrives in York - Preparations for civil war.

HE Scots, who began these fatal commotions, CHAP. thought that they had finished a very perilous undertaking, much to their profit and reputation. Besides the large pay voted them for lying in good quarters during a twelvemonth, the English parliament had conferred on them a present of 300,000 pounds for their brotherly affidance. In the articles of pacification, they were declared to have ever been good subjects; and their military expeditions were approved of, as enterprises calculated • and intended for his majesty's honour and advantage. To carry farther the triumph over their sovereign, these terms, so ignominious to him, were ordered, by a vote of parliament, to be read in all churches, upon a day of thanksgiving, appointed for the national pacification : All their claims for the restriction of prerogative were agreed to be ratified: And what they more valued than all these advantages; they had a near prospect of spreading the presbyterian discipline in England and Ireland, from the feeds which they had scattered, of their religious principles. Never did refined Athens fo

Nalson, vol. i. p. 747. May, p. 104.
Rushworth, vol. v. p. 365. Clarendon, vol. ii. p. 293.

LV. 3641.

CHAP. exult in diffusing the sciences and liberal arts over a favage world; never did generous Rome so please herself in the view of law and order established by her victorious arms; as the Scots now rejoiced, in communicating their barbarous zeal and theological fervour to the neighbouring nations.

Aug. 14. Settlement of Scot. and.

CHARLES, despoiled in England of a considerable part of his authority, and dreading still farther encroachments upon him, arrived in Scotland, with an intention of abdicating almost entirely the small share of power which there remained to him, and of giving full fatisfaction, if possible, to his restless subjects in that kingdom.

THE lords of articles were an ancient institution in the Scottish parliament. They were constituted after this manner. The temporal lords chose eight bishops: The bishops elected eight temporal lords: These sixteen named eight commissioners of counties, and eight burgesses: And without the previous confent of the thirty-two, who were denominated lords of articles, no motion could be made in parliament. As the bishops were entirely devoted to the court, it is evident that all the laws of articles, by necesfary consequence, depended on the king's nomination; and the prince, besides one negative after the" bills had passed through parliament, possessed indirectly another before their introduction; a prerogative of much greater consequence than the former. The bench of bishops being now abolished, the parliament laid hold of the opportunity, and totally let aside the lords of articles: And till this important point was obtained, the nation, properly speaking, could not be said to enjoy any regular freedom:

IT is remarkable that, notwithstanding this institution, to which there was no parallel in England, the royal authority was always deemed much lower in Scotland than in the former kingdom. Bacon represents it as one advantage to be expected from the union, that the too extensive prerogative of England would be abridged by the example of Scotland, and the too narrow prerogative of Scotland be enlarged from the imitation of England. The English were, at that time, a civilized people, and obedient to the laws: But among the Scots, it was of little consequence how the laws were framed, or by whom voted, while the exorbitant aristocracy had it so much in their power to prevent their regular execution.

Burnet, M. m.

The peers and commons formed only one house in the Scottish parliament: And as it had been the practice of James, continued by Charles, to grace English gentlemen with Scottish titles, all the determinations of parliament, it was to be feared, would in time depend upon the prince, by means of these votes of foreigners, who had no interest or property in the nation. It was therefore a law deserving approbation, that no man should be created a Scotch peer, who possessed not 10,000 marks (above 500 pounds) of annual rent in the kingdom.

A LAW for triennial parliaments was likewise passed; and it was ordained, that the last act of every parliament should be to appoint the time and place for holding the parliament next ensuing "...

THE king was deprived of that power formerly exercised, of issuing proclamations, which enjoined obedience under the penalty of treason: A presogative which invested him with the whole legislative authority, even in matters of the highest importance.

So far was laudable: But the most fatal blow given to royal authority, and what in a manner dethroned the prince, was the article, that no member of the privy council, in whose hands, during the [&]quot; Burnet, Mem. " Istem, ibid. " Idem, ibid.

CHAP. king's absence, the whole administration lay, no officer of state, none of the judges, should be appointed, but by advice and approbation of parliament. Charles even agreed to deprive of their feats, four judges who had adhered to his interests; and their place was supplied by others more agreeable to the ruling party. Several of the covenanters were also fworn of the privy council. And all the ministers of state, counsellors, and judges, were, by law, to hold their places during life or good behaviour.

THE king, while in Scotland, conformed himself entirely to the established church; and assisted with great gravity at the long prayers and longer fermons with which the prelbyterians endeavoured to regale He bestowed pensions and preferments on Henderson, Gillespy, and other popular preachers; and practifed every art to soften, if not to gain, his greatest enemics. The earl of Argyle was created a marquis, lord Loudon an earl, Lesley was dignisied with the title of carl of Leven 2. His friends, he was obliged, for the present, to neglect and overlook: Some of them were disgusted: And his enemies were not reconciled; but ascribed all his caresses and favours to artifice and necessity.

ARGYLE and Hamilton, being seized with an apprehension, real or pretended, that the earl of Crawfurd and others meant to assassinate them, left the parliament fuddenly, and retired into the country: But, upon invitation and affurances, returned in a few days. This event, which had neither cause nor effect that was visible, nor purpose, nor consequence, was commonly denominated the incident. though the incident had no effect in Scotland; what was not expected, it was attended with confequences in England. The English parliament whichwas now assembled, being willing to awaken the people's tenderness by exciting their fears, immediately took the alarm; as if the malignants, so CHAP. they called the king's party, had laid a plot at once to murder them, and all the godly in both kingdoms. They applied, therefore, to Essex, whom the king had left general in the fouth of England, and he ordered a guard to attend them 1.

Off. 20.

y Burnet, Mem.

Z Clarendon, vol. ii. p. 309.

Bur while the king was employed in pacifying the commotions in Scotland, and was preparing to return to England, in order to apply himself to the same salutary work in that kingdom; he received intelligence of a dangerous rebellion broken out in Ireland, with circumstances of the utmost horror, bloodshed, and devastation. On every side this unfortunate prince was purfued with murmurs, difcontent, faction, and civil wars; and the fire from all quarters, even by the most independent accidents, at once blazed up about him.

THE great plan of James, in the administration of Ircland, continued by Charles, was, by justice and peace, to reconcile that turbulent people to the autherity of laws, and introducing art and industry mnong them, to cure them of that floth and barbarisin to which they had ever been subject. In order to serve both these purposes, and at the same time fecure the dominion of Ireland to the English crown, great colonies of British had been carried over, and, being intermixed with the Irish, had every where introduced a new face of things into that country. During a peace of near forty years, the inveterate quarrels between the nations seemed, in a great measure, to be obliterated; and though much of the landed property, forfeited by rebellion, had been conferred on the new planters, a more than equal return had been made by their instructing the natives in tillage, building, manufactures, and all the civilized arts of life. This had been the course of chefter, Grandison, Falkland, and, above all, of Strafford. Under the government of this latter nobleman, the pacific plans, now come to greater maturity, and forwarded by his vigour and industry, feemed to have operated with full success, and to have bestowed, at last, on that savage country, the face of an European settlement.

Whitlocke, p. 40. Dugdale, p. 72. Rurnet's Memoirs of the House of Bamilton, p. 184, 185. Clarendon, p. 299. Du John Temple's Irish Rabellion, p. 12.

AFTER Strafford fell a victim to popular rage, the humours excited in Ireland by that great event could not suddenly be composed, but continued to produce the greatest innovations in the government.

THE British protestants, transplanted into Ireland, having every moment before their eyes all the horrors of popery, had naturally been carried into the opposite extreme, and had universally adopted the highest principles and practices of the puritans. Monarchy, as well as the hierarchy, was become odious to them; and every method of limiting the authority of the crown, and detaching themselves from the king of England, was greedily adopted and pursued. They considered not, that as they scarcely formed the fixth part of the people, and were fecretly obnoxious to the ancient inhabitants, their only method of supporting themselves was by maintaining royal authority, and preserving a great dependence on their mother-country. The English commons, likewise, in their furious persecution of Strafford, had overlooked the most obvious confequences; and while they imputed to him, as a crime, every discretionary act of authority, they despoiled all succeeding governors of that power, by which alone the Irish could be retained in subjection. And so strong was the current for popular government in all the three kingdoms, that the most established maxims of policy were every where abandoned, in order to gratify this ruling passion.

vield to the Irish, as to the Scottish and English parliaments; and found too, that their encroachments still rose in proportion to his concessions. Those subsidies, which themselves had voted, they reduced, by a subsequent vote, to a fourth part: The court of high commission was determined to be a grievance: Martial law abolished: The jurisdiction of the council annihilated: Proclamations and acts of state declared of no authority: Every order or institution, which depended on monarchy, was invaded; and the prince was despoiled of all his prerogative, without the least pretext of any violence or illegality in his administration.

THE standing army of Ireland was usually about 3000 men; but in order to assist the king in suppressing the Scottish covenanters, Strafford had raised 8000 more, and had incorporated with them a thousand men, drawn from the old army; a ne--cessary expedient for bestowing order and discipline on the new-levied soldiers. The private men in this army were all catholics; but the officers, both commission and non-commission, were protestants, and could entirely be depended on by Charles. The English commons entertained the greatest apprehensions on account of this army; and never ceased soliciting the king, till he agreed to break it: Nor would they consent to any proposal for augmenting the standing army to 5000 men; a number which the king deemed necessary for retaining Ireland in obedience.

CHARLES, thinking it dangerous that 8000 men accustomed to idleness, and trained to the use of arms, should be dispersed among a nation so turbulent and unsettled, agreed with the Spanish ambassador to have them transported into Flanders, and enlisted in his master's service. The English commons, pretending apprehensions, lest regular bodies

αf

EHAP. of troops, disciplined in the Low Countries, should prove still more dangerous, shewed some aversion to this expedient; and the king reduced his allowance to 4000 men. But when the Spaniards had hired ships for transporting these troops, and the men were ready to embark; the commons, willing to show their power, and not displeased with an opportunity of curbing and affronting the king, prohibited every one from furnishing vessels for that service. And thus the project, formed by Charles, of freeing the country from these men was unfortunately disappointed .

THE old Irish remarked all these false steps of the English, and resolved to take advantage of them. Though their animofity against that nation, sor want of an occasion to exert itself, seemed to be extinguished, it was only composed into a temporary and deceitful tranquillity d. Their interests, both with regard to property and religion, secretly stimulated them to a revolt. No individual of any sept, according to the ancient cultams, had the property of any particular estate; but as the whole sept, had a title to a whole territory, they ignorantly preferred this barbarous community before the more secure and narrower possessions assigned them by the Eng-An indulgence, amounting almost to a toleration, had been given to the catholic religion: But so long as the churches and the ecclesiastical revenues were kept from the priests, and they were obliged to endure the neighbourhood of profane heretics, being themselves discontented, they continually endeavoured to retard any cordial reconciliations between the English and the Irish nations.

Conspiracy in Iteland.

THERE was a gentleman called Roger More, who, though of a narrow fortune, was descended from an Clarendon, vol. i. p. 281. Rushworth, vol. v. p. 381. Dugdale, p. 75. May, book it. p. 3. d Temple, p. 14.

ancient Irish family, and was much celebrated among CHAP. his countrymen for valour and capacity. This man first form d the project of expelling the English, and afferting the independency of his native country. He secretly went from chiefain to chiefrain, and roused up every latent principle of discortent. He maintained a close correspos dence with lord Maguire and fir Phelim O'Neale, the most powerful of the old Irish. By conversation, by letters, by his emissaries, he represented to his countrymen the motives of a revolt. Hie observed to them, that by the rebellion of the Scots, and factions of the English, the King's authority in Britain was reduced to fo low a condition, that he never could exert himself with any vigour in maintaining the English dominion over Ireland; that the catholics, in the Irish house of commons, assisted by the protestants, had so diminished the royal prerogative, and the power of the lieutenant, as would much facilitate the -conducting, to its defired effect, any conspiracy or combination which could be formed; that the Scots having so successfully thrown off dependence on the crown of England, and assumed the government into their own hands, had fet an example to the Irith, who had so much greater oppressions to complain of; that the English planters, who had expelled them their possessions, suppressed their religion, and bereaved them of their liberties, were but a handful in comparison of the natives; that they lived in the most supine security, interspersed with their numerous enemies, trusting to the protection of a small army, which was itself scattered in inconsiderable divisions throughout the whole kingdom; that a great body of men, disciplined by the government, were now thrown loofe, and were ready for any daring or desperate enterprise; that though the catholics had hitherto enjoyed, in some tole-

^{*} Nalson, vol. ii. p. 543.

CHAP. table measure, the exercise of their religion, from the moderation of their indulgent prince, they must henceforth expect, that the government will be conducted by other maxims and other principles; that the puritanical parliament, having at length subdued their fovereign, would, no doubt, as foon as they had confolidated their authority, extend their ambitious enterprises to Ireland, and make the catholics in that kingdom feel the fame furious perfecution to which their brethren in England were at prefent exposed; and that a revolt in the Irish, tending only to vindicate their native liberty against the violence of foreign invaders, could never, at any time, be deemed rebellion; much less during the present confusions, when their prince was, in a manner, a prisoner, and obedience must be paid, not to him, but to those who had traitcroully uturped his lawful anthority .

By these considerations, More engaged all the heads of the native Irish into the conspiracy. The English of the pale, as they were called, or the old English planters, being all catholics, it was hoped would afterwards join the party, which restored their religion to its ancient splendour and authority. The intention was, That fir Phelim O'Neale and the other conspirators should begin an insurrection of one day throughout the provinces, and should attack all the English settlements; and that, on the fame day, Lord Maguire and Roger More should furprise the castle of Dublin. The commencement of the revolt was fixed on the approach of winter, that there might be more difficulty in transporting forces from England. Succours to themselves and supplies of arms they expected from Frances in confequence of a promise made them by cardinal Richelicu. And many Irish oslicers, who served in the Spanish troops, had engaged to join them, as soon as they saw an insurrection entered upon by CHA'P. their catholic brethren. News, which every day arrived from England, of the fury expressed by the commons against all papists, struck fresh terror into the Irish nation, and both stimulated the conspirators to execute their fatal purpole, and gave them affured hopes of the concurrence of all their countrymen 2.

³ Tenques p. 72, -3. 78. Dugdale, p. 73.

Such propenfity to a revolt was discovered in all the brish, that it was deemed unnecessary, as it was dangerous, to entrust the secret to many hands; and the appointed day drew nigh, nor had any difcovery been yet made to the government. The king, indeed, had received information from his ambaffadors, that fomething was in agitation among the Irith in foreign parts; but though he gave warning to the administration in Ircland, the intelligence was entirely neglected h. Secret rumours likewife were heard of Iome approaching conspiracy; but no attention was paid to them. The earl of Leicester, whom the king had appointed lieutenant, remained in London. The two justices, fir William Parsons and fir John Borlace, were men of final abilities; and, by an inconvenience common to all factious .times, owed their advancement to nothing but their acal for the party by whom every thing was now governed. Tranquil from their ignorance and inexpensence, these men indulged themselves in the most profound repose, on the very brink of destruction.

Bur they were awakened from their fecurity, on the very day before that which was appointed for the commencement of hostilities. The castle of Dublin, by which the capital was commanded, contained arms for 10,000 men, with thirty-five pieces of cannon, and a proportionable quantity of ammu-

V Dugdale, p. 14.

h Rushworth, vol. v. p. 408. Nalson, vol. ii. p. 565.

CHAP. nition: Yet was this important place guarded, and that too without any care, by no greater force than fifty men. Maguire and More were already in town with a numerous band of their partifans: Others were expected that night: And, next morning, they were to enter upon, what they esteemed the easiest of all enterprises, the surprisal of the castle. O'Conolly, an Irishman, but a protestant, betrayed the conspiracy to Parsons! The justices and council fled immediately for fafety into the castle, and reinforced the guards. The alarm was conveyed to the city, and all the protestants prepared for defence. More escaped; Maguire was taken; and Mahone, one of the conspirators, being likewise seized, first discovered to the justices the project of a general insurrection, and redoubled the apprehensions which already were univerfally diffused throughout Dublin k.

Irish insurrection and mastacie.

Bur though O'Conolly's discovery saved the castle from a surprise, the confession extorted from Mahone came too late to prevent the intended infurrection. O'Neale and his confederates had already taken arms in Ulster. The Irish, every where intermingled with the English, needed but a hint from their leaders and priests to begin hostilities against a people whom they hated on account of their religion, and envied for their riches and prosperity. The houses, cattle, goods, of the unwary English were first seized. Those who keard of the commotions in their neighbourhood, instead of deferting their habitations, and assembling for mutual protection, remained at home, in hopes of defending their property, and fell thus separately into the hands of their enemics. After rapacity had fully exerted itself, cruelty, and the most barbarous that ever, in any nation, was known or heard.

Rushworth, vol. v. p. 399. Nalson, vol. ii. p. 520. book in p. 6. k Temple, p. 17, 18, 19, 20. Rush. vol. v. p. 400.

of, began its operations. An universal massacre CHAP. commenced of the English, now defenceless, and LV. pallively resigned to their inhuman foes. No age, no fex, no condition was spared. The wife weeping for her butchered husband, and embracing her helpless children, was pierced with them, and perished by the same stroke". The old, the young, the vigorous, the infirm, underwent a like fate, and were confounded in one common ruin. In vain did flight save from the first assault: Destruction was, every where, let loofe, and met the hunted victims at every turn. In vain was recourse had to relations, to companions, to friends: All connexions were diffolved, and death was dealt by that hand, from which protection was implored and expected. Without provocation, without opposition, the astonished English, living in profound peace and full security, were massacred by their nearest neighbours, with whom they had long upheld a continual intercourse of kindness and good offices .

Bur death was the flightest punishment inslicted by those rebels: All the tortures which wanton cruelty could devise, all the lingering pains of body, the anguish of mind, the agonies of despair, could not satiate revenge excited without injury, and cruelty derived from no cause. To enter into particulars would shock the least delicate humanity. Such enormities, though attested by undoubted evidence, appear almost incredible. Depraved nature, even perverted religion, encouraged by the utmost licence, reach not to such a pitch of serocity; unless the pity inherent in human breasts be destroyed by that contagion of example, which transports men beyond all the usual motives of conduct and behaviour.

n Temple, p. 40.

o Idem, p. 39, 40.

CHAP. 1641.

THE weaker fex themselves, naturally tender to their own fufferings, and compassionate to those of others, here emulated their more robust companions in the practice of every cruckty. Even children, taught by the example, and encouraged by the exhortation of their parents, essayed their feeble blows on the dead carcaffes or defenceless children of the English 4. The very avarice of the Irish was not a fufficient restraint of their cruelty. Such was their frenzy, that the cattle which they had feized, and by rapine made their own, yet, because they bore the name of English, were wantonly flaughtered, or, when covered with wounds, turned look into the woods and deferts .

The flately buildings or commodious habitations of the planters, as if upbraiding the floth and ignorance of the natives, were confumed with fire, or laid level with the ground. And where the miferable owners, flun up in their houses, and preparing for defence, perished in the slames, together with their wives and children, a double triumph was alforded to their infulting foes.

Ir any where a number affembled together, and, assuming courage from despair, were resolved to iweeten death by revenge on their affaffins; they were difarmed by capitulations, and promifes of fafety, confirmed by the most solemn oaths. But no tooner had they furrendered, than the rebels, with perfidy equal to their cruely, made them share the fate of their unhappy countrymen 's

OTHERS, more ingenious still in their barbarity, tempted their prisoners by the fond love of life, to embrue their hands in the blood of friends, brothers, parents; and having thus rendered them ac-

⁹ Temple, P Temple, p. 96. 101. Rush. vol. v. p. 415. r Idem, p. 84. 8 Idem, p. 99. 106. Rusi. p. 100. Whitlocke, p. 47. Rush, vol. v. p. 416. yel. v. p. 414. complices complices in guilt, gave them that death, which CHAP.

they fought to thun by deferving it ".

Amost all these enormities, the sacred name of 1641. Relacion resounded on every side; not to stop the hands of these murderers, but to enforce their blows, and to steel their hearts against every movement of human or focial fympathy. The English, as heretics, abhorred of God, and detestable to all holy men, were marked out by the pricits for flaughter; and, of all actions, to rid the world of these declared enemies to catholic faith and picty, was represented as the most meritorious". Nature, which, in that rude people, was fufficiently inclined to atrocious deeds, was farther flimulated by precept; and national prejudices empoifoned by those averfions, more deadly and incurable, which arose from an enraged superstition. While death sinished the fafferings of each victim, the bigoted affaffins, with . joy and exultation, Itill cchoed in his expiring ears, that thele agonies were but the commencement of torments infinite and eternal

Such were the barbarities, by which fir Phelim O'Neale and the Irish in Ulster signalized their rebellion: An event, memorable in the annals of hu-"man kind, and worthy to be held in perpetual detestation and abhorrence. The generous nature of alore was flocked at the recital of fuch enormous cruelfies. He flew to O'Neale's camp; but found that his authority, which was fufficient to excite the hish to an infurrection, was too feeble to referain their inhumanity. Soon after, he abandoned a cause polluted by fo many crimes; and he retired into Sir Phelini, recommended by the great-Flanders. nefs of his family, and perhaps too, by the unrelirained brutality of his nature, though without any courage or capacity, acquired the entire ascendant.

^{&#}x27; remple, p. 100. w Idem, p. 85. 306. x Idem, p. 94.
, 107, 108. Ruthworth, vol. v. 407.

440

CHAP over the northern rebels. The English colonies were totally annihilated in the open country of Ulster: The Scots, at first, met with more favourable treatment. In order to engage them to a paffive neutrality, the Irish pretended to distinguish between the British nations; and claiming friendship and confanguinity with the Scots, extended not over them the fury of their massacres. Many of them found an opportunity to fly the country: Others retired into places of security, and prepared themselves for defence: And by this means, the Scottish planters, most of them at least, escaped with their lives".

FROM Ulster, the slames of rebellion dissused themselves in an instant over the other three provinces of Ireland. In all places death and flaughter were not uncommon; though the Irish, in these other provinces, pretended to act with moderation and humanity. But cruel and barbarous was their humanity! Not content with expelling the English their houses, with despoiling them of their goodly manors, with wasting their cultivated fields; they stripped them of their very clothes, and turned them out, naked and defenceless, to all the severities of the season. The heavens themselves, as if conspiring against that unhappy people, were armed with cold and tempest unusual to the climate, and executed what the merciles sword had left unfinished b. The roads were covered with crowds of naked English, hastening towards Dublin, and the other cities, which yet remained in the hands of their countrymen. The feeble age of children, the tender sex of women, soon sunk under the multiplied rigours of cold and hunger. Here, the husband, bidding a final adicu to his expiring family, envied them that fate which he himself expected so soon to thare: There, the fon, having long supported his b Idem ? p. 64.

Rush. vol. i. p. 416. y Temple, p. 44. z Idem, p. 41. a Temple, p. 4z.

aged parent, with reluctance obeyed his last com- CHAP, mands, and abandoning him in this uttermost distress, reserved himself to the hopes of avenging that death, which all his efforts could not prevent or delay. The astonishing greatness of the calamity deprived the sufferers of any relief from the view of companions in affliction. With filent tears, or lamentable cries, they hurried on through the hostile territories; and found every heart which was not steeled by native barbarity, guarded by the more implacable furies of mistaken piety and religion.

THE laving of Dublin preserved in Ireland the remains of the English name. The gates of that city, though timoroufly opened, received the wretched supplicants, and presented to the view a scene of human misery beyond what any eye had ever before beheld d. Compassion seized the amazed inhabitants, aggravated with the fear of like calamities; while they observed the numerous foes without and within, which every where environed them, and reflected on the weak resources by which they were themselves supported. The more vigorous of the unhappy lugitives, to the number of three thousand, were inlifted into three regiments: The rest were distributed into the houses; and all care was taken, by diet and warmth, to recruit their feeble and torpid limbs. Diseases of unknown name and species, derived from these multiplied distresses, seized many of them, and put a speedy period to their lives: Others, having now leisure to reflect on their mighty loss of friends and fortune, curred that being which they had faved. Abandoning themselves to despair, refusing all succour, they expired; without other coniolation than that of receiving among their countrymen the honours of a grave, which, to their flaughtered companions, had been denied by the inhuman barbarians '.

1641.

c Temple, p. 88. d Idem, p. 62. c Idem, p. 43. 62.

C H A T.
1.V.
1641.

By some computations, those who perished by all these cruelties are supposed to be a hundred and sifty, or two hundred thousand: By the most moderate, and probably the most reasonable account, they are made to amount to 40,000; if this estimation itself be not, as is usual in such cases, somewhat expensed.

aggerated.

THE justices ordered to Dublin all the bodies of the army which were not furrounded by the rebels; and they affembled a force of 1500 veteraus. They foon inlifted, and armed from the magazines, above 4000 men more. They dispatched a body of 600 men to throw relief into Tredah, besieged by the Irish. But these troops, attacked by the enemy, were feized with a panic, and were most of them put to the fword. Their arms, falling into the hands of the hish, supplied them with what they most wanted'. The justices, willing to foment the rebellion, in a view of profiting by the multiplied forfeitures, henceforth thought of nothing more than providing for their own prefent fecurity, and that of the capital. The earl of Ormond, their general, remonstrated against such timid, not to say base and interested counsels; but was obliged to submit to authority.

at first in the fecret, pretended to blame the infurrection, and to detest the barbarity with which is was accompanied. By their protestations and declarations, they engaged the justices to supply them with arms, which they promised to employ in defence of the government. But in a little time, the interests of religion were found more prevalent over them, than regard and duty to their mother-country. They chose lord Gormanstone their leader; and, joining the old Irish, rivalled them in every act of violence towards the English protestants. Besides many Nalson, vol. ii. p. 905.

Temple, p. 33. Rush. vol. v.

Temple, p. 60. Borlace, Hist. p. 28.

fmaller

finaller bodies dispersed over the kingdom, the CHAP. principal army of the rebels amounted to twenty thousand men, and threatened Dublin with an immediate fiege '.

Born the English and Irish rebels conspired in one imposture, with which they seduced many of their deluded countrymen: They pretended authority from the king and queen, but chiesly from the latter, for their insurrection; and they assimmed, that the cause of their taking arms was to vindicate royal prerogative, now invaded by the puritanical parliament. Sir Phelim O'Neale, having sound a royal patent in lord Causield's house, whom he had murdered, tore off the seal, and assixed it to a commission which he had forged for himself.

. The king received an account of this infurreetion, by a mellenger dispatched from the north of Ireland. He immediately communicated his intelligence to the Scottilli parliament.. He expected that the mighty zeal expressed by the Scots for the protestant religion would immediately engage them to fly to its defence, where it was so violently invailed: He hoped that their horror against popery, a religion which now appeared in its most horrible 'aspect, would second all his exhortations: He had observed with what alacrity they had twice run to arms, and affembled troops, in opposition to the rights of their fovereign: He saw with how much greater facility they could now collect forces, which had been very lately difbanded, and which had been to long emired to military discipline. The cries of their affrighted and distressed brethren in Ireland, he promised himself, would powerfully incite them to fend over fuccours, which could arrive to quickly, and aid them with fuch promptitude in this uttermost distress. But the zeal of the Scots, as is usual among religious fects, was very feeble, when not CHAP. stimulated either by faction or by interest.' They now considered themselves entirely as a republic, and made no account of the authority of their prince, which they had utterly annihilated. Conceiving hopes from the present distresses of Ireland, they resolved to make an advantageous bargain for the fuccours with which they should supply their neighbouring nation. And they cast their eye towards the English parliament, with whom they were already so closely connected, and who could alone fulfil any articles which might be agreed on. Except dispatching a small body to support the Scottish colonies in Ulster, they would, therefore, go no farther- at present, than sending commissioners to London, in order to treat with that power, to whom the fovercign authority was now in reality transferred ".

Idem, ibid. p. 402

LV.

> THE king too, sensible of his utter inability to fubdue the Irish rebels, found himself obliged, in this exigency, to have recourse to the English parliament, and depend on their assistance for supply. communicating to them the intelligence which he had received, he informed them, that the infurrection was not, in his opinion, the refult of any rash enterprise, but of a formed conspiracy against the crown of England. To their care and wisdom, therefore, he said, he committed the conduct and profecution of the war, which, in a cause so important to national and religious interests, must of necessiity be immediately entered upon, and vigoroufly purfued ".

Meeting of the English parisament,

THE English parliament was now assembled; and discovered, in every vote, the same dispositions in which they had separated. The exalting of their own authority, the diminishing of the king's, were still the objects pursued by the majority. Every attempt which had been made to gain the popular

m Rushworth, vol. v. p. 407. * Clarendon, vol. ii. p. 301.

leaders, and by offices to attach them to the crown, CHAP. had failed of success, either for want of skill in conducting it, or by reason of the slender preferments which it was then in the king's power to confer. The ambitious and enterprising patriots disdained to accept, in detail, of a precarious power; while they deemed it so easy, by one bold and vigorous affault, to possess themselves for ever of the entire fovereignty. Sensible that the measures which they had hitherto purfued, rendered them extremely obnoxious to the king; were many of them in themselves exceptionable; some of them, strictly speaking, illegal; they resolved to seek their own fecurity, as well as greatness, by enlarging po-pular authority in England. The great necessities to which the king was reduced; the violent prejudices which generally, throughout the nation, prevailed against him; his facility in making the most important concessions; the example of the Scotz, whose encroachments had totally subverted monarchy: All these circumstances farther instigated the commons in their invasion of royal prerogative. And the danger to which the constitution scemed to have been so lately exposed, persuaded .. many, that it never could be sufficiently secured, but by the entire abolition of that authority which had invaded it.

Beer this project, it had not been in the power, scargely in the intention, of the popular leaders to execute, had it not been for the passion which seized the nation for presbyterian discipline, and for the wild enthusiasm which at that time accompanied it. The license which the parliament had bestowed on this spirit, by checking ecclesiastical authority; the countenance and encouragement with which they had honoured it; had already diffused its influence to a wonderful degree: And all orders of men had drunk deep of the intoxicating poison. In every discourse or conversation, this mode of religion entered;

CHAP. tered; in all business it had a share: every elegant pleasure or amusement it utterly annihilated; many vices or corruptions of mind it promoted; even difeases and bodily distempers were not totally exempted from it; and it became requisite, we are told, for all physicians to be expert in the spiritual profession, and, by theological considerations, to allay those religious terrors with which their patients were fo generally haunted. Learning itself, which tends fo much to enlarge the mind, and humanife the temper, rather ferved on this occasion to exalt that epidemical frenzy which prevailed. Rude as yet, and imperfect, it supplied the difinal fanaticifm with a variety of views, founded it on fome coherency of system, chriched it with different figures of elocution; advantages with which a people, totally ignorant and barbarous, had been happily unacquainted.

> From policy, at first, and inclination, now from necessity, the king attached himself extremely to the hierarchy: For like reasons, his enemies were determined, by one and the fame effort, to overpower the church and monarchy.

WHILL the commons were in this disposition, the Irish rebellion was the event which tended most to; promote the views in which all their measures terminated. A horror against the papists, however innocent, they had constantly encouraged; atterror from the conspiracies of that sect, however improbable, they had at all times endeavoured to excite. Here was broken out a rebellion, dreadful and unexpected; accompanied with circumstances the most detestable of which there ever was any record: And what was the peculiar guilt of the Irish catholics, it was no difficult matter, in the present disposition of men's minds, to attribute to that whole feet, who were already fo much the object of general abhor-Accustomed, in all invectives, to join the prelatical party with the papills, the people immediately diately supposed this infurrection to be the result of CHAP. their united counsels. And when they heard that Lv. the Irish rebels pleaded the king's committion for all their acts of violence; bigotry, ever credulous and malignant, affeitted without feruple to that groß imposture, and loaded the unhappy prince with the whole enormity of a contrivance to barbarous and inhumam °.

1.641.

By the difficulties and diffresses of the crown, the commons, who possessed alone the power of supply, had aggrandifed themselves; and it seemed a pecuhar happiness, that the Irish rebellion had succeeded, at so critical a juncture, to the pacification of Scotland. That expression of the Ling's, by which he committed to them the care of Ireland, they inmediately laid hold of, and interpreted in the most unlimited fense. They had, on other occasions, been gradually encroaching on the executive power of the crown, which forms its principal and most natural branch of authority; but, with regard to Ircland, they at once assumed it, fully and entirely, as if delivered over to them by a regular gift or allignment. And to this usurpation the king was obliged passively to submit; both because of his inability to refitt, and left he should still more ex-"pole himself to the reproach of favouring the progress of that odious rebellion.

True project of introducing farther innovations in England being once formed by the leaders among the commons, it became a necessary consequence, that their operations with regard to Ireland should, all of them, be considered as subordinate to the . former, on whose success, when once undertaken, their own grandeur, fecurity, and even being, must entirely depend. While they pretended the utmost zeal against the Irish insurrection, they took no steps · towards its suppression, but such as likewise tended CHAP. to give them the superiority in those commotions which they foresaw must so soon be excited in England. The extreme contempt entertained for the natives in Ireland, made the popular leaders believe, that it would be casy at any time to suppress their rebellion, and recover that kingdom: Nor were they willing to lose, by too hasty success, the advantage which that rebellion would afford them in their projected encroachments on the prerogative. By assuming the total management of the war, they acquired the courtship and dependence of every one who had any connexion with Ireland, or who was desirous of inlisting in these military enterprises: They levied money under pretence of the Irish expedition; but referved it for purposes which concerned them more nearly: They took arms from the king's magazines; but still kept them with a fecret intention of employing them against himself: Whatever law they deemed necessary for aggrandising themselves, was voted, under colour of enabling them to recover Ireland; and if Charles withheld the royal affent, his refusal was imputed to those pernicious counsels which had at first excited the popish rebellion, and which still threatened total destruction to the protestant interest throughout all his dominions q. And though no forces were for a long time sent over to Ireland, and very little money remitted during the extreme distress of that kingdom; so strong was the people's attachment to the commons, that the fault was never imputed to those pious zealots, whose votes breathed nothing but death and destruction to the Irish rebels.

To make the attack on royal authority by regular approaches, it was thought proper to frame a general remonstrance of the state of the nation; and accordingly, the committee, which, at the first meeting of parliament had been chosen for that purpose, CHAP. and which had hitherto made no progress in their LV. work, received fresh injunctions to finish that undertaking.

P Clarendon, vol. ii. p. 435. Sir Ed. Walker, p. 6.

Ralfon, vol. ii. p. 618. Clarendon, vol. iv. p. 590.

THE committee brought into the house that re- The remonstrance, which has become so memorable, and monwhich was foon afterwards attended with fuch important consequences. It was not addressed to the king; but was openly declared to be an appeal to the people. The harshness of the matter was equalled by the severity of the language. It consists of many gross falschoods intermingled with some evident truths: Malignant infinuations are joined to open invectives: Loud complaints of the past, accompanied with jealous prognostications of the fu-Whatever unfortunate, whatever invidious, whatever suspicious measure had been embraced by the king, from the commencement of his reign, is infifted on and aggravated with merciless rhetoric: · The unfuccessful expeditions to Cadiz; and the isle of Rhé, are mentioned: The fending of ships to France for the suppression of the hugonots: The forced loans: The illegal confinement of men for not obeying illegal commands: The violent dissolution of four parliaments: The arbitrary government which always succeeded: The questioning, sining, and imprisoning of members for their conduct in the house: The levying of taxes without consent of the commons: The introducing of superstitious innovations into the church, without authority of law: In short, every thing which, either with or without reason, had given offence, during the course of sisteen years, from the accession of the king to the calling of the present parliament. though all these grievances had been already redressed, and even laws enacted for future security against their return, the praise of these advantages was ascribed, not to the king, but to the parliament who had extorted his confent to such salutary statutes. G g Their

Vol. VI.

CHAP. Their own merits too, they afferted, towards the king, were no less eminent than towards the people. Though they had seized his whole revenue, rendered it totally precarious, and made even their temporary supplies be paid to their own commissioners, who were independent of him; they pretended that they had liberally supported him in his necessities. By an infult still more egregious, the very giving of money to the Scots, for levying war against their sovereign, they represented as an instance of their duty towards him. And all their grievances, they said, which amounted to no less than a total subvertion of the constitution, proceeded entirely from the formed combination of a popish faction, who had ever swayed the king's counsels, who had endeavoured, by an uninterrupted effort, to introduce their superstition into England and Scotland, and who had now, at last, excited an open and bloody chellion in Ireland '.

> This remonstrance, so full of acrimony and violence, was a plain fignal for some farther attacks intended on royal prerogative, and a declaration, that the concessions already made, however important, were not to be regarded as fatisfactory. What pretensions would be advanced, how unprecedented, how unlimited, were easily imagined; and nothing, less was foreseen, whatever ancient names might be preserved, than an abolition, almost total, of the monarchical government of England. The oppolition, therefore, which the remonstrance met with in the house of commons, was great. For above fourteen hours, the debate was warmly managed; and from the weariness of the king's party, which probably " confilled chiefly of the elderly people, and men of cool fpirits, the vote was at last carried by a small majority of eleven. Some time after, the remon-

22d Nov.

r Rush. vol. v. p. 438. Nalson, vol ii. p. 694. 3 Whielocke, p. 49. Dogdale, p. /1., Nalson, vol. ii. p. 668.

strance was ordered to be printed and published, CHAP. without being carried up to the house of peers for peers their affent and concurrence.

1641.

WHEN this remonstrance was dispersed, it excited Reasons every where the same violent controversy, which at- indes. tended it when introduced into the house of commons. This parliament, faid the partifans of that affembly, have at length profited by the fatal example of their predecessors; and are resolved that the labric, which they have generously undertaken to near for the protection of liberty, shall not be left to future ages insecure and impersect. At the time when the petition of right, that requisite vindication of a violated constitution, was extorted from the unwilling prince; who but imagined that liberty was at last secured, and that the laws would thonceforth maintain themselves in opposition to arbitrary authority? But what was the event? a right was indeed acquired to the people, or rather their ancient right was more exactly defined > But as the power of invading it still remained in the prince, no somer did an opportunity offer, than he totally disregarded all laws and preceding engagements, and made his will and pleasure the sole rule of government. Those lofty ideas of monarchical authority, Thich he has derived from his early education, which are united in his mind with the irrefistible illusions of self-love, which are corroborated by his mistaken principles of religion, it is in vain to hope that, in his more advanced age, he will fincerely renounce from any subsequent reflection or experience. Such conversions, if ever they happen, are extremely rare; but to expect that they will be derived from necessity, from the jealousy and resentment of antagonists, from blame, from reproach, from apposition, must be the result of the fondest and most blind credulity. These violences, however necessary, are sure to irritate a prince against limitations

Gg 2

C'HAP. ations fo cruelly imposed upon him; and each concession, which he is constrained to make, is regarded as a temporary tribute paid to faction and sedition, and is fecretly attended with a resolution of seizing every favourable opportunity to retract is. Nor should we imagine, that opportunities of that kind will not offer in the course of human affairs. Governments, especially those of a mixed kind, are in continual fluctuation: The humours of the people change perpetually from one extreme to another: And no resolution can be more wise, as well as more just, than that of employing the prefent advantages against the king, who had formerly pushed much less tempting ones to the utmost extremities against his people and his parliament. It is to be feared, that, if the religious rage which has feized the multitude be allowed to evaporate, they will quickly return to the ancient ecclesiastical establishment; and, with it, embrace those principles of flavery, which it inculcates with fuch zeal on its fubmissive proselytes. Those patriots, who are now the public idols, may then become the objects of general detestation; and equal shouts of joy attend their ignominious execution, with those which second their present aftvantages and triumphs. Nor ought the apprehension of such an event to be regarded in them as a selfish consideration: In their safety is involved the security of the laws: The patrons of the constitution cannot suffer without a satal blow to the constitution: And it is but justice in the public to protect, at any hazard, those who have so generoufly exposed themselves to the utmost hazard for the public interest. What though monarchy, the ancient government of England, be impaired, during these contests, in many of its sormer prerogatives: The laws will flourish the more by its decay; and it is happy, allowing that matters are really carried beyond the bounds of moderation, that the current at least runs towards liberty, and CHAP.

that the error is on that side, which is safest for the general interest of mankind and society.

THE best arguments of the royalists against a farther attack on the prerogative were founded more on opposite ideas, which they had formed of the past events of this reign, than on opposite principles of government. Some invasions, they said, and those too of moment, had undoubtedly been made on national privileges: But were we to look for the cause of these violences, we should never find it to confist in the wanton tyranny and injustice of the prince, not even in his ambition or immoderate appetite for authority. The hostilities with Spain, in which the king, on his accession, found himself cugaged, however imprudent and unnecessary, had proceeded from the advice, and even importunity of the parliament; who deserted him immediately after they had embarked him in those warlike measures. A young prince, jealous of honour, was naturally afraid of being soiled in his first enterprise, and had not as yet attained such maturity of counsel, as to perceive that his greatest honour lay in preserving the laws inviolate, and gaining the full confidence of his people. The rigour of the subsequent parliaments had been extreme with regard to many articles, particularly tonnage and poundage; and had reduced the king to an absolute necessity, if he would preserve entire the royal prerogative, of levying those duties by his own authority, and of breaking through the forms, in order to maintain the spirit, of the constitution. Having once made so perilous a step, he was naturally induced to continue, and to confult the public interest, by imposing shipmoney, and other moderate, though irregular, burdens and taxations. A fure proof that he had formed no system for enslaving his people is, that the chief object of his government has been to raise a 'naval, not a military force; a project useful, ho- $\mathbf{G} \mathbf{g} \mathbf{3}$ nourable,

CHAP. nourable, nay indispensably requisite, and in spite of his great necessities, brought almost to a happy conclusion. It is now full time to free him from all these necessities, and to apply cordials and lenitives, after those severities, which have already had their full course against him. Never was sovereign blessed with more moderation of temper, with more justice, more humanity, more honour, or a more gentle disposition. What pity that such a prince should so long have been harassed with rigours, sulpicions, calumnics, complaints, encroachments; and been forced from that path in which the rectitude of his principles would have inclined him to have constantly trod! If some few instances are sound of violations made on the petition of right, which he himself had granted; there is an easier and more natural way for preventing the return of like inconveniencies, than by a total abolition of royal autho-Let the revenue be fettled, fuitably to the ancient dignity and splendour of the crown; let the public necessities be fully supplied; let the remaining articles of prerogative be left untouched; and the king, as he has already lost the power, will lay aside the will, of invading the constitution. From what quarter can jealousies now arise? What farther se curity can be defired or expected? The king's preceding concellions, so far from being insufficient for public security, have rather erred on the other extreme; and, by depriving him of all power of selfdefence, are the real cause why the commons are emboldened to raise pretensions hitherto unheard of in the kingdom, and to subvert the whole system. of the constitution. But would they be content with moderate advantages, is it not evident that, besides other important concessions, the present parliament may be continued, till the government be accustomed to the new track, and every part be restored to full harmony and concord? By the triennial act a perpetual succession of parliaments is established, while the king possesses no independent power or LV. military force, by which he can be supported in his invasion of them. No danger remains, but what is inseparable from all free constitutions, and what forms the very essence of their freedom: The danger of a change in the people's disposition, and of general disgust, contracted against popular privileges. To prevent such an evil, no expedient is more proper, than to contain ourselves within the bounds of moderation, and to consider that all extremes, naturally and infallibly, beget each other. In the fame manner as the past usurpations of the crown, however excusable on account of the necessity or provocations whence they arose, have excited an immcasurable appetite for liberty; let us beware, lest our encroachments, by introducing anarchy, make the people seek shelter under the peaceable and despotic rule of a monarch. Authority, as well as liberty, is requisite to government; and is even requisite to the support of liberty itself, by maintaining the laws, which can alone regulate and protest it. What madness, while every thing is so happily settled under ancient forms and institutions, now more exactly poised and adjusted, to try the hazardous experiment of a new constitution, and renounce the mature wisdom of our ancestors for the crude whimsies of turbulent innovators! Besides the certain and inconceivable mischiefs of civil war; are not the perils apparent, which the delicate frame of liberty must inevitably sustain amidst the surious shock of arms? Which-ever side prevails, she can scarcely hope to remain inviolate, and may suffer no less, or rather greater injuries from the boundless pretensions of forces engaged in her cause, than from the invasion of enraged troops, inlisted on the side of monarchy.

THE king, upon his return from Scotland, was Nov. 25. received in London with the shouts and acclama-G g 4.

EHAP. tions of the people, and with every demonstration LV. of regard and affection'. Sir Richard Gournay, lord mayor, a man of moderation and authority, had promoted these favourable dispositions, and had engaged the populace, who so lately insulted the king, and who so soon after made furious war upon him, to give him these marks of their dutiful attachment. But all the pleasure which Charles reaped from this joyous reception, was foon damped by the remonstrance of the commons, which was presented him, together with a petition of a like strain. The bad counsels which he followed are there complained of; his concurrence in the Irish rebellion plainly infimuated; the scheme laid for the introduction of popery and superstition inveighed against; and, as a remedy for all these evils, he is defired to entrust every office and command to perfons in whom his parliament should have cause to By this phrase, which is so often repeated in all the memorials and addresses of that time, the commons meant themselves and their adherents.

> As fooir as the remonstrance of the commons was published, the king dispersed an answer to it. In this contest he lay under great disadvantages. Not only the ears of the people were extremely prejudiced against him; the best topics, upon which he could justify, at least apologise for his former conduct, were such as it was not safe or prudent for him at this time to employ. So high was the national idolatry towards parliaments, that to blame the past conduct of these assemblies, would have been very ill received by the generality of the peo-So loud were the complaints against regal usurpations, that, had the king afferted the prerogative of supplying, by his own authority, the deficiencies in government, arising from the obstinacy

Rushworth, vol. v. p. 429.

⁴ Idem, ibid. p. 437. Nalfoli, vol. ii. p. 692.

of the commons, he would have increased the cla- C H A P. mours with which the whole nation already resounded. Charles, therefore, contented himself with observing in general, that even during that period so much complained of, the people enjoyed a great measure of happiness, not only comparatively, in respect of their neighbours, but even in respect of those times which were justly accounted the most fortunate. He made warm protestations of fincerity in the reformed religion; he promised indulgence to tender consciences with regard to the ceremonies of the church; he mentioned his great concessions to national liberty; he blamed the infamous libels every-where dispersed against his perfon and the national religion; he complained of the general reproaches thrown out in the remonstrance with regard to ill counsels, though he had protected no minister from parliamentary justice, retained no unpopular servant, and conferred offices on no one who enjoyed not a high character and estimation in the public. "If, notwithstanding this," he adds, " any malignant party shall take heart, and be will-" ing to facrifice the peace and happiness of their " country to their own finister ends and ambition, " under whatever pretence of religion and con-'46 science; if they shall endeavour to lessen my re-" putation and interest, and to weaken my lawful " power and authority; if they shall attempt, by "" Effcountenancing the present laws, to loosen the bands of government, that all disorder and con-" fusion may break in upon us; I doubt not but "God in his good time will discover them to « me, and that the wisdom and courage of my "high court of parliament will join with me in their suppression and punishment "." Nothing

CHAP. shows more evidently the hard situation in which Charles was placed, than to observe, that he was obliged to confine himself within the limits of civility towards subjects who had transgressed all bounds of regard, and even of good manners, in the treatment of their fovereign.

THE first instance of those parliamentary encroachments which Charles was now to look for, was, the bill for pressing soldiers to the service of Ireland. This bill quickly passed the lower house. In the preamble, the king's power of pressing, a power exercised during all former times, was declared illegal, and contrary to the liberty of the subject. By a necessary consequence, the prerogative which the crown had ever assumed of obliging men to accept of any branch of public service, was abolished and annihilated: A prerogative, it must be owned, not very compatible with a limited monarchy. In order to elude this law, the king offered to raise 10,000 volunteers for the Irish service: But the commons were afraid lest fuch an army should be too much at his devotion. Charles, still unwilling to submit to so considerable a diminution of power, came to the house of peers, and offered to pass the law without the preamble; by which means, he said, that ill-timed question with" regard to the prerogative would for the present be avoided, and the pretensions of each party be left entire. Both houses took fire at this measure, which, from a similar instance while the bill of attainder against Strafford was in dependence, Charles might foresee would be received with resentment. The lords, as well as common's, passed a vote, declaring it to be a high breach of privilege for the king to take notice of any bill which was in agitation in either of the houses, or to express his sentiments with regard to it, before it be presented to him him for his affent in a parliamentary manner. The CHAP. king was obliged to compose all matters by an LV. apology *.

THE general question, we may observe, with regard to privileges of parliament, has always been, and still continues, one of the greatest mysteries in the English constitution; and, in some respects, notwithstanding the accurate genius of that government, these privileges are at present-as undetermined as were formerly the prerogatives of the Such privileges as are founded on long precedent cannot be controverted: But though it were certain that former kings had not, in any instance, taken notice of bills lying before the houses (which yet appears to have been very common), it follows not, merely from their never exerting fuch a power, that they had renounced it, or never were possessed of it. Such privileges also as are essential to all free assemblies which deliberate, they may be allowed to assume, whatever precedents may prevail: But though the king's interpolition, by an offer or advice, does in some degree overawe or restrain liberty; it may be doubted whether it imposes such evident violence as to entitle the parliament, without any other authority or concession, to 'claim the privilege of excluding it. But this was the favourable time for extending privileges; and had none more exorbitant or unreasonable been challenged, few bad consequences had followed. The establishment of this rule, it is certain, contributes to the order and regularity, as well as freedom, of parliamentary proceedings.

True interpolition of peers in the election of commoners was, likewise about this time declared a breach of privilege; and continues ever since to be condemned by votes of the commons, and universally practised throughout the nation.

^{*} Rushworth, vol. v. p. 457, 458, &c. Chuendon, vol. ii. p. 327. Nalson, vol. ii. p. 738, 750, 751, &c.

CHAP. Every measure pursued by the commons, and, still more, every attempt made by their partisans, were full of the most inveterate hatred against the hierarchy, and showed a determined resolution of subverting the whole ecclesiastical establishment. Befides numberless vexations and persecutions which the clergy underwent from the arbitrary power of the lower house, the peers, while the king was in Scotland, having passed an order for the observance of the laws with regard to public worship, the commons assumed such authority, that, by a vote alone of their house, they suspended those laws, though enacted by the whole legislature: And they particularly forbade bowing at the name of Jesus; a practice which gave them the highest scandal, and which was one of their capital objections against the established religion. They complained of the king's filling five vacant fees, and confidered it as. an infult upon them, that he should complete and strengthen an order, which they intended foon entirely to abolish. They had accused thirteen bishops of high treason, for enacting canons without confent of parliament *, though from the foundation of the monarchy no other method had ever been practised: And they now insisted that the peers, upon this general accusation, should sequester those bishops from their feats in parliament, and commit them to prison. Their bill for taking away the bishops. votes had last winter been rejected by the peers: But they again introduced the same bill, though no prorogation had intervened; and they endeavoured, by fome minute alterations, to elude that rule of parliament which opposed them. And when they fent up this bill to the lords, they made a demand, the most absurd in the world, that the bishops, being all of them parties, should be refused a vote

y Rushworth, vol. v. p. 385, 386. Nalson, vol. ii. p 482.

with regard to that question. After the resolution was once formed by the commons, of invading the established government of church and state, it could not be expected that their proceedings, in such a violent attempt, would thenceforth be aitogether regular and equitable: But it must be confessed, that, in their attack on the hierarchy, they still more openly passed all bounds of moderation, as supposing, no doubt, that the sacredness of the cause would sufficiently atone for employing means the most irregular and unprecedented. This principle, which prevails so much among zealots, never displayed itself so openly as during the transactions of this whole period.

But, notwithstanding these efforts of the commons, they could not expect the concurrence of the upper house, either to this law, or to any other which they should introduce for the farther limita-· tion of royal authority. The majority of the peers adhered to the king, and plainly forefaw the deprefsion of nobility, as a necessary consequence of popular usurpations on the crown. The insolence, indeed, of the commons, and their haughty treatment of the lords, had already risen to a great height, and gave fusficient warning of their fature attempts upon that order. They muttered somewhat of their regret that they should be obliged to save the kingdoin alone, and that the house of peers would have no part in the honour. Nay, they went so far as openly to tell the lords, "That they themselves were the representative body of the whole kingdom, and that the peers were nothing but individuals, who held their feats in a particular ca-" pacity: And therefore, if their lordships will not confent to the passing of acts necessary for the preservation of the people, the commons, together with such of the lords as are more sensible of the b Clarendon, vol. ii. p. 304.

LV. 1641.

CHAP. " danger, must join together, and represent the " matter to his majesty"." So violent was the democratical, enthusiastic spirit diffused throughout the nation, that a total confusion of all rank and order was justly to be apprehended; and the wonder was not, that the majority of the nobles should feek shelter under the throne, but that any of them should venture to desert it. But the tide of popularity feized many, and carried them wide of the most established maxims of civil policy. Among the opponents of the king are ranked the earl of Northumberland, lord admiral, a man of the first family and fortune, and endowed with that dignified pride which so well became his rank and station: The earl of Kilex, who inherited all his father's popularity, and having from his early youth fought renown in arms, united to a middling capacity that rigid inflexibility of honour which forins the proper ornament of a nobleman and a foldier: Lord Kimbolton, soon after earl of Manchester, a person distinguished by humanity, generosity, assability, and every amiable virtue. These men, finding that their credit ran high with the nation, ventured to encourage those popular disorders, which, they vainly imagined, they pollelled authority fulficient to regulate and controul.

In order to obtain a majority in the upper house, the commons had recourse to the populace, who on other occasions had done them such important tervice. Amidst the greatest security, they assected continual fears of destruction to themselves and the nation, and feemed to quake at every breath or rumour of danger. They again excited the people by never-ceasing inquiries after conspiracies, by reports of insurrections, by feigned intelligence of invalions from abroad, by discoveries of dangerous combinations at home among papists and their adherents. When Charles dismissed the guard which CHAP. they had ordered during his absence, they complained; and, upon his promifing them a new guard, under the command of the earl of Lindeley, they absolutely refused the offer, and were well pleased to infinuate, by this instance of jealousy, that their danger chiefly arose from the king himsels. They ordered halberts to be brought into the hall where they assembled, and thus armed themselves against those conspiracies with which they pretended they were hourly threatened. All stories of plots, however ridiculous, were willingly attended to, and were dispersed among the multitude, to whose capacity they were well adapted. Beale, a taylor, informed the commons, that, walking in the fields, he had hearkened to the discourse of certain persons unknown to him, and had heard them talk of a most dangerous conspiracy. A hundred and eight ruffians, as he learned, had been appointed to murder a hundred and eight lords and commoners, and were promised rewards for these alfassinations, ten pounds for each lord, forty shillings for each commoner. Upon this notable intelligence, orders were issued for seizing priests and jesuits, a conference was defired with the lords, and the deputy-lieutenants of fome suspected counties were ordered to put the people in a posture of defence.

Trig pulpits likewife were called in aid, and resounded with the dangers which threatened religion, from the desperate attempts of papilts and malignants. Multitudes flocked towards Westminster, and infulted the prelates and fuch of the lords as ad-. hered to the crown. The peers voted a declaration against those tumults, and sent it to the lower house; but these refused their concurrence. Some sedi-

d Jouin. 30th Nov. 1641. Nalson, vol. ii. p 688.

Nalson, vol. ii. p. 646. Jouin. 16th Nov. 1641. Dugdale, p. 77. f Rushworth, part in. vol. 1. p. 710.

CHAP tious apprentices, being feized and committed to prison, immediately received their liberty, by an order of the commons^g. The sheriffs and justices having appointed constables with strong watches to guard the parliament, the commons fent for the constables, and required them to discharge the watches, convened the justices, voted their orders a breach of privilege, and fent one of them to the Tower h. Encouraged by these intimations of their pleasure, the populace crowded about Whitehall, and threw out infolent menaces against Charles himfelf. Several reduced officers and young gentlemen of the inns of court, during this time of disorder and danger, offered their service to the king. Between them and the populace there passed frequent skirmishes, which ended not without bloodshed. way of reproach these gentlemen gave the rabble the appellation of ROUNDHEADS, on account of the short cropt hair which they wore: These called the others CAVALIERS. And thus the nation, which was before sufficiently provided with religious as well as civil causes of quarrel, was also supplied with party-names, under which the factions might rendezvous, and signalise their mutual hatred '.

Meanwhile the tumults still continued, and even increased about Westminster and Whitehall. The cry incessantly resounded against bishops and rotten-hearted lords k. The former especially, being distinguishable by their habit, and being the object of violent hatred to all the sectaries, were exposed to the most dangerous insults. Williams, now created archbishop of York, having been abused by the populace, hastily called a meeting of his. By his advice a protestation was drawn, brethren. and addressed to the king and the house of lords.

Dec. 27.

The

⁸ Nation, vol. ii. p. 784. 792. h Ibid. p. 792. Journ. 27th. i Clarendon, vol. 11. p. 339. 28th, and 29th of December 1641. 1 Dugdale, p. 78. * Idem, ibid. p. 336.

1641

The bishops there set forth, that though they had an CHAP. undoubted right to sit and vote in parliament, yet in coming thither, they had been menaced, assaulted, affronted, by the unruly multitude, and could no longer with fafety attend their duty in the house. For this reason they protested against all laws, votes, and resolutions, as null and invalid, which should pass during the time of their constrained absence. This protellation, which, though just and legal, was certainly ill-timed, was figned by twelve bishops, and communicated to the king, who hastily approved of it. As foon as it was presented to the lords, that house defired a conference with the commons, whom they informed of this unexpected protestation. The opportunity was seized with joy and triumph. . An impeachment of high treason was Impeachimmediately sent up against the bishops, as endea- ment of the bishops. vouring to subvert the fundamental laws, and to invalidate the authority of the legislature. They were, on the first demand, sequestrated from parliament, and committed to custody. No man, in either house, ventured to speak a word in their vindication; fo much displeased was every one at the egregious imprudence of which they had been guilty. One person alone said, that he did not believe them guilty of high treason; but that they were stark mad, and therefore defired they might be fent to Bedlam ".

1642,

A Few days after, the king was betrayed into another indifcretion, much more fatal: An indifcretion, to which all the enfuing disorders and civil wars ought immediately and directly to be ascribed. . This was the impeachment of lord Kimbolton and the five members.

WHEN the commons employed, in their remonstrance, language so severe and indecent, they had Whitlocke, p. 51. Rushworth, vol. v. p. 466. Nalson, vol. ii. # Clarendon, vol. ii. p. 355. P. 794-

Vol. VI.

Hh

Dot

CHAP. not been actuated entirely by insolence and passion > Their views were more folid and profound. They considered, that in a violent attempt, such as an invasion of the ancient constitution, the niore leisure was afforded the people to reflect, the less would they be inclined to second that rash and dangerous enterprise; that the peers would certainly refuse their concurrence, nor were there any hopes of prevailing on them, but by infligating the populace to tumult and disorder; that the employing of such odious means for so invidious an end, would, at long-run, lose them all their popularity, and turn the tide of favour to the contrary party; and that, if the king only remained in tranquillity, and cautiously cluded the first violence of the tempest, he would, in the end, certainly prevail, and be able at least to preserve the ancient laws and constitution. They were therefore resolved, if possible, to excite him to some violent passion; in liopes that he would commit indifcretions, of which they might. make advantage.

Ir was not long before they succeeded heyond Charles was enraged to find their fondest wishes. that all his concessions but increased their demands; that the people, who were returning to a fense of duty towards him, were again roused to sedition and tumults; that the blackest calumnies were propagated against him, and even the Irish masfacre ascribed to his counsels and machination; and that a method of address was adopted, not only unfuitable towards so great a prince, but which no private gentleman could bear without resentment. When he confidered all these, increasing acts of insolence in the commons, he was apt to ascribe them, in a great measure, to his own indolence and facility. The queen and the ladies of the court farther stimulated his passion, and represented, that, if he exerted the vigour, and displayed the majesty of a monarch, the daring usurpations of his subjects would shrink before him. Lord Digby, a CHAP. man of fine parts, but full of levity, and hurried LV. on by precipitate passions, suggested like counsels; and Charles, who, though commonly moderate in his temper, was ever disposed to hasty resolutions, gave way to the fatal importunity of his friends and fervants.

jects

1642.

HERBERT, attorney general, appeared in the Accordant house of peers, and, in his majesty's name, entered the five an accusation of high treason against lord Kimbol-members. ton and five commoners, Hollis, sir Arthur Hazlerig, Hambden, Pym, and Strode. The articles were, That they had traiterously endeavoured to fubvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom, to deprive the king of his regal power, and to impose on his subjects an arbitrary and tyrannical authority; that they had endeavoured by many foul aspersions on his majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and make him odious to them; that they had attempted to draw his late army to disobedience of his, royal commands, and to side with them in their traiterous designs; that they had invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade the kingdom; that they had aimed at subverting the rights and very being of parliament; that, in order to complete their traiterous designs, they had endeavoured, as far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the parliament to join with them, and to that end, had actually raised and countenanced tumults against the king and parliament; and that they had traitorously conspired to levy, and actually ·had levied, war against the king P.

THE whole world flood amazed at this important accufation, so suddenly entered upon, without concert, deliberation, or reflection. Some of these articles

[·] Clarendon, vol. ii. p. 360.

P Whitlocke, p. 50. Rushworth, vol. v. p. 473. Nalson, vol. iis .P. 811. Franklyn, p. 906. . Hh 2

CHAP. articles of accusation, men said, to judge by appearance, seem to be common between the impeached members and the parliament; nor did these persons appear any farther active in the enterprifes of which they were accused, than so far as they concurred with the majority in their votes and speeches. Though proofs might, perhaps, be produced, of their privately inviting the Scots to invade England; how could fuch an attempt be considered as treason, after the act of oblivion which had passed, and after that both houses, with the king's concurrence, had voted that nation three hundred thousand pounds for their brotherly assistance! While the house of peers are scarcely able to maintain their independency, or to reject the bills fent them by the commons; will they ever be permitted by the populace, supposing them inclined, to pass a fentence, which must totally subdue the lower house, and put an end to their ambitious undertakings? These five members, at least Pym, Hambden, and Hollis, are the very heads of the popular party; and if these be taken off, what fate is ust be expected by their followers, who are many of them accomplices in the fame treason? The punishment of leaders is ever the last triumph over a brokenand routed party; but furely was never before attempted, in opposition to a faction, during the full tide of its power and fuccess.

> Bur men had not leifure to wonder at the indifcretion of this measure: Their astonishment was excited by new attempts, still more precipitate and imprudent. A serjeant at arms, in the king's name, demanded of the holife the five members; and was fent back without any positive answer. Messengers were impleyed to search for them and arrest ilem. Their trunks, chambers, and studies, were fealed and locked. The house voted all these acts of violence to be breaches of privilege, and commanded every one to defend the liberty of the members.

members. The king, irritated by all this oppo-CHAP. fition, resolved next day to come in person to the house, with an intention to demand, permaps seize, in their presence, the persons whom he had accused.

This resolution was discovered to the countess of Carlisse, sister to Northumberland, a lady of spirit, wit, and intrigue. She privately fent intelligence to the five members; and they had time to withdraw, a moment before the king entered. He was accompanied by his ordinary retinue to the number of above two hundred, armed as usual, some with halberts, fome with walking fwords. The king left them at the door, and he himfelf advanced alone through the hall; while all the members rose to receive him. The speaker withdrew from his chair, and the king took possession of it. The speech which he made was as follows: "Gent emen, I am forry for this ". occasion of coming to you. Yesterday, I sent a ferjeant at arms, to demand some, who, by my order, were accused of high treason. Instead of " obedience, I received a message. I must here de-" clare to you, that, though no king that ever was " in England could be more careful of your privi-" leges than I shall be, yet in cases of treason no person has privilege. Therefore am I come to tell you, that I must have these men wheresoever "I can find them. Well, fince I fee all the birds " are flown, I do expect that you will fend them to " nie as foon as they return. But I assure you, on " the word of a king, I never did intend any force, " but shall proceed against them in a fair and legal " way: For I never meant any other. And now "" since I see I cannot do what I came for, I think " this is no unfit occasion to repeat what I have taid "formerly, that whatever I have done in favour " and to the good of my subjects, I do intend to " maintain it "."

⁹ Whitlocke, p. 50. Rushworth, vol. v? p. 474. 475. Whitlocke, p. 51. Wai wick, p. 204. Whitlocke, p. 50. WHEN Hh 3.

CHAP. 1642.

WHEN the king was looking around for the accused members, he asked the speaker, who stood below, whether any of these persons were, in the house? The speaker, falling on his knee, prudently replied: "I have, Sir, neither eyes to see, nor "tongue to speak, in this place, but as the house is " pleased to direct me, whose servant I am. And "I humbly ask pardon, that I cannot give any " other answer to what your majesty is pleased to " demand of me "."

THE commons were in the utmost disorder; and, when the king was departing, some members cried aloud, so as he might hear them, Privilege! privilege! And the house immediately adjourned till next day ".

THAT evening, the accused members, to show the greater apprehension, removed into the city, which was their fortress. The citizens were the whole night in arms. Some people, who were appointed for that purpose, or perhaps actuated by their own terrors, ran from gate to gate, crying out, that the cavaliers were coming to burn the city, and that the king himself was at their head.

NEXT morning Charles fent to the mayor, and ordered him to call a common-council immediately.* About ten o'clock, he himself, attended only by three, or four lords, went to Guildhall. He told the common-council, that he was forry to hear of the apprehensions entertained of him; that he was come to them without any guard, in order to show how much he relied on their affections; and that he had accused certain men of high treason, against, whom he would proceed in a legal way, and therefore prefumed that they would not meet with protection in the city. After many other gracious expressions, he told one of the sherists, who of the two was thought the least inclined to his service, that he would dine with him. He departed the hall without receiving the applause which he expected. In passing through the streets, he heard the cry, Privilege of parliament! privilege of parliament! resounding from all quarters. One of the populace, more insolent than the rest, drew nigh to his coach, and called out with a loud voice, To your tents, O Israel! the words employed by the mutinous Israelites, when they abandoned Rehoboam, their rash and ill-counselled sovereign ".

" Whitlocke, p. 51.

[!] Whitlocke, p. 50. May, book ii. p. 20.

WHEN the house of commons met, they affected the greatest dismay; and adjourning themselves for fome days, ordered a committee to fit in merchant-taylors hall in the city. The committee made an exact inquiry into all circumstances attending the king's entry into the house: Every passionate speech, every menacing gesture of any, even the meanest of his attendants, was recorded and aggravated. An intention of offering violence to the parliament, of seizing the accused members in the very house, and of murdering all who should make resistance, was inferred. And that unparalleled breach of privilege, fo it was called, was still ascribed to the counsel of papists and their adherents. This expression, which then recurred every moment in speeches and memorials, and which at present is so apt to excite laughter in the reader, begat at that time the deepest and most real consternation throughout the kingdom.

A LETTER was pretended to be intercepted, and was communicated to the committee, who pretended to lay great stress upon it. One catholic there congratulates another on the accusation of the members; and represents that incident as a branch of the same pious contrivance, which had excited the Irith insurrection, and by which the profane heretics would soon be exterminated in England *.

w Rushworth, vol. v. p. 479. Clarendon, vol. ii. p. 361.

^{*} Nalion, vol. ii. p. 836.

CHAP. LV.

1642.

THE house again met, and after confirming the votes of their committee, instantly adjourned, as if exposed to the most imminent perils from the violence of their enemies. This practice they continued for some time. When the people, by these affected panics, were wrought up to a sufficient degree of rage and terror, it was thought proper, that the accused members should, with a triumphant and military procession, take their feats in the house. The river was covered with boats, and other vessels, laden with fmall pieces of ordnance, and prepared for fight. Skippon, whom the parliament had appointed, by their own authority, major-general of the Tumults. city-militia, conducted the members, at the head of this tumultuary army, to Westminster-hall. And when the populace, by land and by water, passed Whitehall, they still asked with insulting shouts, What has become of the king and his cavaliers? And whither are they fled"?

King]eaves London.

THE king, apprehensive of danger from the enraged multitude, had retired to Hampton-court, deserted by all the world, and overwhelmed with grief, shame, and remorse, for the fatal measures into which he had been hurried. His distressed. fituation he could no longer ascribe to the rigours, of destiny, or the malignity of enemies: His own precipitancy and indifcretion must bear the blame of whatever disasters should henceforth befal him. The most faithful of his adherents, between sorrow and indignation, were confounded with reflections on what had happened, and what was likely to fol-Seeing every prospect blasted, faction triumphant, the discontented populace inflamed to a degree of fury, they utterly despaired of success in a cause to whose ruin friends and enemies seemed equally to conspire.

THE

y Nalson, vol. ii. p. 833. * Whitlocke, p. 62. Dugdale, p. 82. Clarendon, vol. ii. p. 380.

THE prudence of the king in his conduct of CHAP. this affair nobody pretended to justify. The lega- LV. lity of his proceedings met with many and just apologies; though generally offered to unwilling ears. No maxim of law, it was faid, is more established or more univerfally allowed, than that privilege of parliament extends not to treason, felony, or breach of peace; nor has either house, during former ages, ever pretended in any of those cases to interpose in behalf of its members. Though some inconveniences should result from the observance of this maxim; that would not be fufficient, without other authority, to abolish a principle established by uninterrupted precedent, and founded on the tacit confent of the whole legislature. But what are the inconveniences fo much dreaded? The king, on pretence of treason, may seize any members of the opposite faction, and, for a time, gain to his partifans the majority of voices. But if he seize only a few; will he not lose more friends by such a gross artifice than he confines enemics? If he seize a great number; is not this expedient force, open and barefaced? And what remedy at all times against fuch force, but to oppose to it a force which is superior? Even allowing that the king intended to employ-violence, not authority, for feizing the members; though at that time, and ever afterwards, he positively asserted the contrary; yet will his conduct admit of excuse. That the hall, where the parliament assembles, is an inviolable sanctuary, was never yet pretended. And if the commons complain of the affront offered them, by an attempt to arrest their members in their very presence; the blame must lie entirely on themselves, who had formerly refused compliance with the king's message, when he peaceably demanded these members. reign is the great executor of the laws; and his presence was here legally employed, both in order against those insults which their disobedience had so well merited.

CHARLES knew to how little purpose he should urge these reasons against the present sury of the He proposed, therefore, by a message, commons. that they would agree upon a legal method, by which he might carry on his profecution again the members, lest farther misunderstandings happen with regard to privilege. They defired him to lay the grounds of acculation before the house; and pretended that they must first judge whether it were proper to give up their members to a legal trial. The king then informed them, that he would wave for the present all prosecution: By successive mesfages, he afterwards offered a pardon to the members; offered to concur in any law that should acquit or secure them; offered any reparation to the house for the breach of privilege, of which, he acknowledged, they had reason to complain b. They were resolved to accept of no satisfaction, unless he would discover his advisers in that illegal measure: A condition to which, they knew, that, without rendering himself for ever vile and contemptible, he could not possibly submit. Meanwhile, they continued to thunder against the violation of parlia-" mentary privileges, and, by their violent outcries, to inflame the whole nation. The secret reason of their displeasure, however obvious, they carefully concealed. In the king's accusation of the members, they plainly faw his judgment of late parliamentary proceedings; and every adherent of the " ruling faction dreaded the same fate, should royal authority be re-established in its ancient lustre. the most unhappy conduct, Charles, while he extremely augmented in his opponents the will, had also increased the ability of hurting him.

b Dugdale, p. 24. Rushworth, vol. v. p. 484. 488. 492, &c.

THE more to excite the people, whose dispositions CHAP. were already very seditious, the expedient of petiof Buckingham was presented to the house by six thousand, subscribers, who promised to live and die in defence of the privileges of parliament. The city of London, the county of Essex, that of Hertford, Surry, Berks, imitated the example. petition from the apprentices was graciously received ". Nay, one was encouraged from the porters; whose numbers amounted, as they said, to fifteen thousand . The address of that great body contained the same articles with all the others, the privileges of parliament, the danger of religion, the rebellion of Ireland, the decay of trade. The porters farther desired, that justice might be done upon offenders, as the atrociousness of their crimes had deserved. And they added, That if such remedies were any longer suspended, they should be forced to extremities not fit to be named, and make good the faying, " That necessity has no law"."

Another petition was presented by several poor people, or beggars, in the name of many thousands more; in which the petitioners proposed as a remedy for the public miseries, That these noble worthies of the house of peers, who concur with the happy votes of the commons, may separate themselves from the rest, and sit and vote as one entire body. The commons gave thanks for this petition .

THE very women were seized with the same rage. A brewer's wife, followed by many thousands of her fex, brought a petition to the house; in which the peritioners expressed their terror of the papilts and prelates, and their dread of like massacree, rapes, and outrages, with those which had been committed upon their fex in Ireland. They had

c Rush. vol. v. p. 487.

d Idem, ibid. p. 462. ¹ Clarendon, vol. ii. p. 412.

e Dugdale, p. 87. 5 Idem, ibid. p. 413.

of the women of Teknah: And they claimed equal right with the men, of declaring, by petition, their fense of the public cause; because Christ had purchased them at as dear a rate, and in the free enjoyment of Christ consists equally the happiness of both sexes. Pym came to the door of the house; and having told the female zealots, that their petition was thankfully accepted, and was presented in the fuccess of the commons might follow their petition. Such low arts of popularity were affected! and by such illiberal cant were the unhappy people a seasonable time, he begged that their prayers for incited to civil discord and convulsions!

In the mean time, not only all petitions, which favoured the church or monarchy, from whatever hand they came, were discouraged; but the petitioners were sent for, imprisoned, and prosecuted as delinquents: And this unequal conduct was openly avowed and justified. Whoever desire a change, it was said, must express their sentiments; for how, otherwise, shall they be known? But those who savour the established government in church or state, should not petition; because they already enjoy what they wish for h.

The king had possessed a great party in the lower house, as appeared in the vote for the remonstrance; and this party, had every new cause of disgust been carefully avoided, would soon have become the majority, from the odium attending the violent measures embraced by the popular leaders. A great majority he always possessed in the house of peers, even after the bishops were confined or chased away; and this majority could not have been overcome, but by outrages which, in the end, would have drawn disgrace and ruin on those who incited them. By the present sury of the people, as by an inundation, were all these obstacles swept away, and every rampart of royal CHAP. authority laid level with the ground. The victory was pursued with impetuosity by the sagacious commons, who knew the importance of a favourable moment in all popular commotions. The terror of their authority they extended over the whole nation; and all opposition, and even all blame vented in private conversation, were treated as the most atrocious crimes by these severe inquisitors. Scarcely was it permitted to find fault with the conduct of any particular member, if he made a figure in the · house; and reflections thrown out on Pym, were at this time treated as breaches of privilege. The populace without doors were roady to execute, from the least hint, the will of their leaders; nor was it fafe for any member to approach either house, who prétended to control or oppose the general torrent. After so undisguised a manner was this violence 'conducted, that Hollis, in a speech to the peers, defired to know the names of fuch members as should vote contrary to the sentiments of the commons': And Pym faid in the lower houfe, that the people must not be restrained in the expressions of their just defires k.

Clarendon, vol. ii. p. 449.

By the flight, or terror, or despondency of the king's party, an undisputed majority remained every where to their opponents; and the bills sent up by the commons, which had hitherto stopped with the peers, and would certainly have been rejected, now passed, and were presented for the royal assent. These were, the pressing bill with its preamble, and the bill against the votes of the bishops in parliament. The king's authority was at that time reduced to the lowest ebb. The queen too, being secretly threatened with an impeachment, and sinding no resource in her husband's protection, was preparing to retire into Holland. The rage of the i King's Declar. of 13th of August 1642. k Ibid.

CHAP. people was, on account of her religion, as well as her spirit and activity, universally levelled against her. Usage, the most contumelious, she had hitherto borne with filent indignation. The commons, in their fury against priests, had seized her very confessor; nor would they release him upon her repeated applications. Even a visit of the prince to his mother had been openly complained of, and remonstrances against it had been presented to her 1. Apprehensive of attacks still more violent, she was desirous of facilitating her escape; and she prevailed with the king to pass these bills, in hopes of appeasing for a time the rage of the multitude m.

THESE new concessions, however important, the king immediately found to have no other effect, than had all the preceding ones: They were made the foundation of demands still more exorbitant. From the facility of his disposition, from the weakness of his situation, the commons believed that he could now refuse them nothing. And they regarded the least moment of relaxation, in their invation of royal authority, as highly impolitic, during the uninterrupted torrent of their successes. The very moment they were informed of these last acquisitions, they affronted the queen, by opening some inter-. cepted letters written to her by lord Digby: They. carried up an impeachment against Herbert, attorney-general, for obeying his mafter's commands in accusing their members. And they profutedwith fresh vigour their plan of the militia, on which they rested all future hopes of an uncontrolled authority.

THE commons were fensible that monarchical ' government, which, during so many ages, had been established in England, would soon regain some degree of its former dignity, after the present tempest was overblown; nor would all their new-invented

m Clarendon, vol. ii. p. 428. 1 Nalson, vol. ii. p. 5120

[&]quot; Rushworth, vol. v. p. 489. Clarendon, vol. ii. p. 385.

LV.

1642.

limitations be able totally to suppress an authority, CHAP. to which the nation had ever been accustomed. The fword alone, to which all human ordinances must submit, could guard their acquired power, and fully ensure to them personal safety against the rising indignation of their sovereign. This point, therefore, became the chief object of their aims. large magazine of arms being placed in the town of Hull, they dispatched thither sir John Hotham, a gentleman of considerable fortune in the neighbourhood, and of an ancient family; and they gave him the authority of governor. They sent orders to Goring, governor of Portsmouth, to obey no commands but such as he should receive from the parliament. Not content with having obliged the king to displace Lunsford, whom he had appointed governor of the Tower,, they never ceased soliciting him, till he had also displaced sir John Biron, a inan of unexceptionable character, and had bestowed that command on fir John Confers, in whom alone, they faid, they could repose confidence. After making a fruitless attempt, in which the peers refused their concurrence, to give public warning, that the people should put themselves in a posture of defence against the enterprises of papists and other illaffected persons, they now resolved, by a bold and decisive stroke, to seize at once the whole power of the fword, and to confer it entirely on their own greatures and adherents.

THE severe votes passed in the beginning of this parliament against lieutenants and their deputies, for exercifing powers assumed by all their predecesfors, had totally disarmed the crown, and had not left in any magistrate military authority sufficient for the defence and security of the nation. To remedy this inconvenience now appeared necessary. A bill was introduced and passed the two houses,

Rushworth, vol. v. p. 459.

P Nalson, vol. ii. p. 850.

powers of which the votes of the commons had bereaved them; but at the same time the names of all the lieutinants were inserted in the bill; and these consisted entirely of men in whom the parliament could conside. And for their conduct, they were accountable, by the express terms of the bill, not to the king, but to the parliament.

THE policy purfued by the commons, and which had hitherto succeeded to admiration, was, to asto-nish the king by the boldness of their enterprises, to intermingle no fweetness with their severity, to cmploy expressions no less violent than their pretenfions, and to make him sentible in what little estimation they held both his person and his dignity. a bill to destructive of royal authority, they prefixed, with an infolence feemingly wanton, a preamble equally dishonourable to the personal character of the king. These are the words: "Whereas there " has been of late a most dangerous and desperate . " design upon the house of commons, which we " have just cause to believe an essect of the bloody countels of papilts and other ill-affected persons, who have already raifed a rebellion in the king-" dom of Ireland. And whereas, by reason of " many discoveries, we cannot but fear they will roceed, not only to stir up the like rebellions " and insurrections in this kingdom of England; but also to back them with forces from abroad, &c, 922 ...

HERE Charles first ventured to put a stop to his concessions; and that not by a resusal, but a delay. When this demand was made; a demand which, if granted, the commons justly regarded as the last they should ever have occasion to make; he was at Dover, attending the queen and the princess of Orange, in their embarkation. He replied, that he had not now leisure to consider a matter of so great till his return. The parliament instantly dispatched another message to him, with solicitations still more importunate. They expressed their great grief on account of his majesty's answer to their just and necessary petition. They represented, that any delay, during dangers and distractions so great and pressing, was not less unsatisfactory and destructive than an absolute denial. They insisted, that it was their duty to see put in execution a measure so necessary for public safety. And they assimmed, that 28th Feb. the people, in many counties, had applied to them for that purpose, and, in some places, were of themselves, and by their own authority, providing against those urgent dangers with which they were threatened.

⁴ Rufaworth, vol. v. p. 519.

EVEN after this insolence, the king durst not venture upon a flat denial. Besides excepting to the preamble, which threw fuch dishonour upon him, and protesting the innocence of his intentions when he entered the house of commons; he only desired that the military authority, if it were defective, should first be conferred upon the crown; and he promised to bestow commissions, but such as 'should be revocable at pleasure, on the same perfons whom the parliament had named in the bill '. By a former message he had expressed his wishes, that they would lay before him, in one view, all the concessions which they deemed requisite for the settlement of the nation. They pretended that they were exposed to perils so dreadful and imminent, that they had not leifure for fuch a work". The expedient proposed by the king seemed a sufficient remedy during this emergence; and yet maintained the prerogatives of the crown entire and unbroken.

Bur

Rushworth, vol. v. p. 521.

Idem, ibid.

Idem, ibid. p. 516, 517.

CHAP. LV. 1642.

Bur the intentions of the commons were wide of this purpose, and their panies could be cured by one remedy alone. They instantly replied, that the in Maich. dangers and distempers of the nation were such as could endure no longer delay; and, unless the king fpeedily complied with their demands, they should be constrained, for the safety of prince and people, to dispose of the militia by the authority of both houses, and were resolved to do it accordingly. They afferted, that those parts of the kingdom which had, from their own authority, put themselves in a posture of defence during these prevailing sears and jealouties, had acted fuitably to the declarations and directions of both houses, and conformably to the laws of the kingdom. And while they thus menaced the king with their power, they invited him to fix his refidence at London, where they knew he would be entirely at mercy ".

"I Am so much amazed at this message," said the king in his prompt reply, "that I know not " what to answer. You speak of jealousies and

" fears! . Lay your hands on your hearts, and ask

"yourselves, whether I may not likewise be disturb-

" ed with fears and jealousies: And if so, I assure " you that this message has nothing lessened them. "As to the militia, I thought so much of it be?

" fore I gave that answer, and am so much assured "that the answer is agreeable to what in justice or

" reason you can ask, or I in honour grant, that I " shall not alter it in any point.

44 For my residence near you, I wish it might be fafe and honourable, and that I had no cause.

to absent myself from Whitehall: Ask yourselves

" whether I have not ".

"WHAT would you have? Have I violated your " laws? Have I denied to pass any bill for the ease

* Idem, vol. v. p. 524.

W Rushworth, patt iii. vol. i. chap.iv. p. 523.

1643.

and fecurity of my subjects? I do not ask what CII A P. you have done for me.

"HAVE any of my people been transported with fears and apprehensions.? I offer as free and ge" neral a pardon as yourselves can devise. All this confidered, there is a judgment of Heaven upon this nation if these distractions continue.

"God fo deal with me and mine as all my thoughts and intentions are upright for the maintenance of the true protestant profession, and for the observance and preservation of the laws; and "I hope God will bless and assist those laws for my " preservation "."

No fooner did the commons despair of obtaining the king's consent to their bill, than they instantly voted, that those who advised his majesty's answer were enemies to the state, and mischievous projectors against the safety of the nation; that this denial is of such dangerous consequence, that if his majesty persist in it, it will hazard the peace and tranquillity of all his kingdoms, unless some speedy remedy be applied by the wisdom and authority of both houses; and that such of the subjects as have put themselves in a posture of desence against the common danger, have done nothing but what is justifiable, and approved by the house.

LEST the people might be averse to the seconding of all these usurpations, they were plied anew with rumours of danger, with the terrors of invasion, with the dread of English and Irish papists; and the most unaccountable panics were spread throughout the nation. Lord Digby having entered Kingston in a coach and six, attended by a few livery servants, the intelligence was conveyed to London; and it was immediately voted, that he had appeared in a hostile manner, to the terror and affright of his majesty's subjects, and had levied war against the king and kingdom . Petitions from all quarters loudly demanded of the parliament to"put the nation in a posture of defence; and the county of Stafford, in particular, expressed such dread of an infurcction among the papifts, that every man, they said, was constrained to stand upon his guard, not even daring to go to church unarmed b.

⁷ Rushworth, vol. . p. 532.

² Ibid. part iii. vol. i. chap. iv. p. 524.

CHAP. LV. 1642.

THAT the same violence by which he had so long been oppressed, might not still reach him, and extort his consent to the militia bill, Charles had refolved to remove farther from London: And accordingly, taking the prince of Wales and the duke of York along with him, he arrived, by flow journies, at York, which he determined for some time to make the place of his refidence. The distant parts of the kingdom being removed from that furious vortex of new principles and opinions which had, transported the capital, still retained a sincere regard for the church and monarchy; and the king here found marks of sattachment beyond what he had before expected. From all quarters of England, the prime nobility and gentry, either personally, or by messages and letters, expressed their duty towards, him; and exhorted him to fave himself and them from that ignominious flavery, with which they were threatened. The small interval of time which had passed since the fatal accusation of the members... had been sufficient to open the eyes of many, and to recover them from the aftonishment with which at first they had been seized. One rath and passionate attempt of the king' feemed but a small counterbalance to so many acts of deliberate violence, which had been offered to him and every branch of the legislature: And, however sweet the found of liberty, many resolved to adhere to that moderate.

> 2 Clarendon. Rush. part iii. vol. i. cl.ap ii. p. 495. Dugdale, p. 89. Warwick, p. 203.

freedom transmitted them from their ancestors, and now

now better fecured by fuch important concessions; CHAP. rather than, by engaging in a giddy fearch after more independence, run a manifest risk either of incurring a cruck subjection, or abandoning all law and order.

1642.

CHARLES, finding himself supported by a confiderable par y in the kingdom, began to speak in a firmer tone, and to retort the acculations of the commons with a vigour which he had not before Notwith tanding their remoultrances, and menaces, and intuits, he still perfished in refusing their bill; and they proceeded to frame an ordinance, in which, by the authority of the two houses, without the king's confent, they named lieutenants for all the counties, and conferred on them the command of the whole military force, of all the guards, garrisons, and forts or the kingdom. He issued proclamations against this manifest usurpation: And as he professed a resolution strictly to observe the law himself, so was he determined, he said, to oblige every other person to pay it a like obedience. naniz of the king was so essential to all laws, and so familiar in all acts of executive authority, that the parliament was afraid, had they totally omitted it, • that the innovation would be too fensible to the people. In all commands, therefore, which they conferred, they bound the persons to obey the orders of his majesty, signified by both houses of parliament. And, inventing a distinction, hitherto unheard of, between the office and the person of the king; those very forces which they employed against him they levied in his name and by his authority d.

I'r is remarkable how much the topics of argument were now reversed between the parties. The king, while he acknowledged his former error, of employing a plea of necessity in order to infringe the laws and constitution, warned the parliament not CHAP. to imitate an example on which they threw such violent blame; and the parliament, while they clothed their personal sears or ambition under the appearance of national and imminent danger, made unknowingly an apology for the most exceptionable part of the king's conduct. That the liberties of the people were no longer exposed to any peril from royal authority, fo narrowly circumscribed, fo exactiv defined, fo much unsupported by revenue and by military power, might be maintained upon very plausible topics: But that the danger, allowing it to have any existence, was not of that kind; great, urgent, inevitable; which dissolves all law, and levels all limitations; feems apparent from the simplest view of these transactions. So obvious indeed was the king's present inability to invade the constitution, that the fears and jealousies which operated on the people, and pushed them so furiously to arms, were undoubtedly not of a civil, but of a religious nature. The distempered imaginations of men were agitated with a continual dread of popery, with a horror against ptelacy, with an antipathy to ceremonies and the liturgy, and with a violent affection for whatever was most opposite to these objects of aversion. The fanatical spirit let loose, confounded . all regard to ease, safety, interest; and dissolved. every moral and civil obligation.".

Each party was now willing to throw on its antagonist the odium of commencing a civil war; but both of them prepared for an event which they deemed inevitable. To gain the people's favour and good opinion, was the chief point on both sides. Never was there a people less corrupted by vice, and more actuated by principle, than the English during that period: Never were there individuals who possessed more capacity, more courage, more public spirit, more disinterested zeal. The infusion of one ingredient, in too large a proportion, had cor- CHAP, rupted all these noble principles, and converted them into the most virulent poison. To determine his choice in the approaching contests, every man hearkened with avidity to the reasons proposed on both sides. The war of the pen preceded that of the fword, and daily sharpened the humours of the opposite parties. Besides private adventurers without number, the king and parliament themselves carried on the controversy, by messages, remonstrances, and declarations; where the nation was really the party to whom all arguments were addressed. Charles. had here a double advantage. Not only his cause was more favourable, as supporting the ancient government in church and state against the most illegal pretensions: It was also defended with more art and eloquence. Lord Falkland had accepted the office of fecretary; a man who adorned the purest virtue with the richest gifts of nature, and the most valuable acquisitions of learning. By him, assisted by the king himself, were the memorials of the royal party chiefly composed. So sensible was Charles of his superiority in this particular, that he took care to disperse every where the papers of the parliament together with his own, that the people , might be the more enabled, by comparison, to form a judgment between them: The parliament, while tliey distributed copies of their own, were anxious .to suppress all the king's compositions f.

^{*} See note [DD] at the end &f the volum .

1642.

To clear up the principles of the constitution, to mark the boundaries of the powers entrusted by law to the several members, to show what great improvements the whole political system had received from the king's late concessions, to demonstrate his entire confidence in his people, and his reliance on their assections, to point out the ungrateful returns which had been made him, and the enormous encroachexposed; these were the topics which, with so much justness of reasoning and propriety of expression, were insisted on in the king's declarations and remonstrances.

Though these writings were of consequence, and tended much to reconcile the nation to Charles, it was evident that they would not be decisive, and that keener weapons must determine the controversy. To the ordinance of the parliament concerning the militia, the king opposed his commisfions of array. The counties obeyed the one or the other, according as they stood affected. many counties, where the people were divided, mobbish combats and skirmishes ensued b. The parliament, on this occasion, went so far as to vote, That when the lords and commons in parlia-" ment, which is the supreme court of judicature, " shall declare what the law of the land is, to have " this not only questioned, but contradicted, is a "high breach of their privileges"." This was a plain assuming of the whole legislative authority, and exerting it in the most material article, the government of the militia. Upon the same principles, they pretended, by a verbal criticism on the tense of a Latin verb, to ravish from the king his negative. voice in the legislature k.

The magazine of Hull contained the arms of all the forces levied against the Scots; and sir John-Hotham, the governor, though he had accepted of a commission from the parliament, was not thought to be much disassected to the church and the king, by his coronation oath, promifes that he would thaintain the laws and customs which the people had chosen, quast vuigus elegerit: The parliament pretended that elegerit meant shall chisse; and consequently, that the king had no right to refuse any bills which should be presented him. See Rushworth, vol. v. p. 580-monarchy. Charles, therefore, entertained hopes, CHAR that, if he presented himself at Hull before the commencement of hostilities, Hotham, overawed by his presence, would admit him with his retinue; after which he might easily render hin:self master of the place. But the governor was on his guard. He fhut the gates, and refused to receive the king, who defired leave to enter with twenty perfons only. Charles immediately proclaimed him traitor, and complained to the parliament of his disobedience. The parliament avowed and justified the action '.

See note [EE] at the end of the volume. May, hock ii.

THE county of York levied a guard for the king Preparaof 600 men: For the kings of Eugland had hitherto lived among their subjects like fathers among their children, and had derived all their fecurity from the dignity of their character, and from the protection of the laws. The two houses, though they had already levied a guard for themselves, had attempted • to seize all the military power, all the navy, and all the forts of the kingdom; and had openly employed their authority in every kind of warlike preparation:: Yet immediately voted, f' That the king, "feduced by wicked counsel, intended to make " war against his parliament, who, in all their con-"fultations and actions, had proposed no other . " end but the care of his kingdoms, and the per-"formance of all duty and loyalty to his person; "that this attempt was a breach of the trust re-." posed in him by his people, contrary to his oath, " and tending to a diffolution of the government; " and that whoever should assist him in such a war, "were traitors by the fundamental laws of the 66 kingdom "."

The armies, which had been every-where raised on pretence of the service in Ireland, were henceforth

4

Whitlocke, p. 55. Rush. vol. v. p. 565, &c. May, book ii. p. 51. m Whitlocke, p. 57. Rushworth, vol. v. p. 717. Dugdale, p. 93. May, book ii. p. 54.

1642.

CHAP forth more openly inlifted by the parliament for their own purposes, and the command of them was given to the earl of Essex. In London no less than four thousand men inlisted in one day". And the parliament voted a declaration, which they required every member to subscribe, that they would live and die with their general.

soth June.

THEY issued orders for bringing in loans of money and plate, in order to maintain forces which should defend the king and both houses of parliament: For this style they still preserved. Within ten days, vast quantities of plate were brought to their treafurers. Hardly were there men enow to receive it, or room sufficient to stow it: And many, with regret, were obliged to carry back their offerings, and wait till the treasurers could find leisure to receive them. Such zeal animated the pious partisans of the parliament, especially in the city! The women gave up all the plate and ornaments of their; houses, and even their silver thimbles and bodkins, in order to support the good cause against the malignants °.

MEANWHILE the splendor of the nobility, with which the king was environed, much eclipsed the appearance at Westminster. Lord-keeper Littleton, after fending the great feal before him, had fled to York. Above forty peers of the first rank attended the king p; while the house of lords seldom confisted of more than sixteen members. Near the moiety too of the lower house absented the siselves from counsels which they deemed so full of danger. The commons sent up an impeachment against nine pecrs, for deferting their duty in parliament. Their own members also, who should return to them, they voted not to admit, till satisfied concerning the reason of their absence.

. Whitlocke, p. 58. Dugdale, * Vicas's God in the Mount. P May, book ii. p. 59. p. 96. 99.

11

CHARLES

CHARLES made a declaration to the peers who CHAP. attended him, that he expected from them no obedience to any commands which were not warranted by the laws of the land. The peers answered this declaration by a protest, in which they declared their resolution to obey no commands but such as were warranted by that authority 4. By these deliberate engagements, so worthy of an English prince and English nobility, they meant to confound the furious and tumultuary resolutions taken by the parliament.

THE queen, disposing of the crown-jewels in Holland, had been enabled to purchase a cargo of arms and ammunition. Part of these, after escaping many perils, arrived fafely to the king. His preparations were not near so forward as those of the parliament. In order to remove all jealoufy, he had refolved, that their usurpations and illegal predensions should be apparent to the whole world, and thought, that to recover the confidence of the people was a point much more material to his interest than the collecting of any magazines, stores, or armies, which might breed apprehensions of violent or illegal counsels. But the urgent necessity of his fituation no longer admitted of delay. He now prepared himself for defence. With a spirit, activity, and address, which neither the one party apprehended, nor the other expected, he employed all the advantages which remained to him, and roused up his adherents to arms. The resources of this prince's genius increased in proportion to his difficulties; and he never appeared greater than when plunged into the deepest perils and distresses. From the mixed character, indeed, of Charles, arose in part the misfortunes in which England was at this His political errors, or rather time involved. weaknesses, had raised him inveterate enemies: His

⁹ Rushworth, vol. v. p. 626, 627. May, book ii. p. 86. Warwick, p. 210. eminent partifans: And between the hatred of the one, and the affections of the other, was the nation agitated with the most violent convulsions.

THAT the king might despair of all composition, the parliament fent him the conditions on which they were willing to come to an agreement. Their demands, contained in ninetecn propositions, amounted to a total abolition of monarchical authority. They required, that no man should remain in the council, who was not agreeable to parliament; that no deed of the king's should have validity, unless it passed the council, and was attested under their hand; that all the officers of state and principal judger thousa be chefen with confent of parliament, and enjoy their offices for life; that none of the royal family should marry without confent of parliament or council; that the laws should be executed against catholics; that the votes of... popith lords should be excluded; that the reformation of the liturgy and church-government should have place, according to advice of parliament; that the ordinance, with regard to the militia, be fubmitted to; that the jultice of parliament pass upon all delinquents; that a general pardon be granted, with fuch exceptions as should be advised by parliament;. that the forts and castles be disposed of by consent of parliament; and that no peer be made but with confent of both houses.

"Should I grant these demands," said the king in reply, "I may be waited on bareheaded; I may have my hand kissed; the title of Majesty may be continued to me; and The king's authority, "Ignified by both houses, may still be the style of your commands; I may have swords and maces carried before me, and please myself with the fight of a crown and sceptre (though even these ^{*} Rushworth, vol. v. p. 722. Mry, book ii. p. 54.

"twigs would not long flourish, when the stock upon "which they grew was dead): But as to true and "real power, I should remain but the outside, but "the picture, but the sign of a king." War on any term as esteemed, by the king and all his counsellors, prescrable to so ignominious a peace. Charles accordingly resolved to support his authority by arms. "His towns," he said, "were taken "from him, his ships, his arms, his money; but there still remained to him a good cause, and the hearts of his loyal subjects, which, with God's blessing, he doubted not, would recover all the "rest." Collecting therefore some forces, he advanced southwards; and at Nottingham he erected 25th Aug. his royal standard, the open signal of discord and civil war throughout the kingdom.

² Richworth, vol. v. p. 728. Warwick, p. 189.

CHAP. LVI.

Commencement of the civil war—State of parties
—Battle of Edgekill—Negotiation at Oxford —Victories of the royalists in the west—Battle of Stratton—Of Lansdown—Of Roundway down—Death of Hambden—Bristol taken—Siege of Gloucester—Battle of Newbury—Actions in the North of England—Solemn league and covenant—Arming of the Scots—State of Ireland.

CHAP.

r642. Commencement of the civil war.

State of parties.

HEN two names, so sacred in the English constitution as those of King and Parliament; were placed in opposition; no wonder the people were divided in their choice, and were agitated with the most violent enimosities and factions.

THE nobility, and more confiderable gentry, dreading a total confusion of rank from the fury of the populace, inlisted themselves in defence of the monarch, from whom they received, and to whom they communicated, their lustre. Animated with the spirit of loyalty, derived from their ancestors, they adhered to the ancient principles of the constitution, and valued themselves on exerting the maxims, as well as inheriting the possessions, of the old English families. And while they passed their time mostly at their country-seats, they were surprised to hear of opinions prevailing, with which they had ever been unacquainted, and which implied not a limitation, but an abolition almost total, of monarchical authority.

THE city of London, on the other hand, and most of the great corporations, took part with the parliament,

LVI.

1642-

parliament, and adopted with zeal those Liemocra. CHAP. tical principles on which the pretentions of that assembly were founded. The government of cities, which even under absolute monarchies is commonly republican, inclined them to this party: The finall hereditary influence, which can be retained over the industrious inhabitants of towns; the natural independence of citizens; and the force of popular currents over those more numerous affociations of mankind; all these causes gave, there, authority to the new principles propagated throughout the nation. Many families too, which had lately been enriched by commerce, faw with indignation, that, notwithstanding their opulence, they could not raile themselves to a level with the ancient gentry: They therefore adhered to a power, by whose success they hoped to acquire rank and confideration. And the new splendour and glory of the Dutch commonwealth, where liberty so happily supported industry, made the commercial part of the nation desire to fee a like form of government established in England?

THE genius of the two religions, so closely at this time interwoven with politics, corresponded exactly to these divisions. The presbyterian religion was new, republican, and fuited to the genius of the populace: The other-had an air of greater flow and ernament, was established on ancient authority, and bore ar affinity to the kingly and ariltocratical parts of the constitution. The devotees of preibytery became of course zealous partitans of the parliament: The friends of the episcopal church valued themselves on defending the rights of monarchy.

Some men also there were of liberal education, who, being either careless or ignorant of those disputes bandied about by the clergy on both fides, aspired to nothing but an easy enjoyment of life,

E Clarendon, vol. iii, p.,

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

CHAP, amidst the jovial entertainment and social intercourse tvi. of their companions. All these slocked to the king's standard, where they breathed a freer air, and were exempted from that rigid preciseness and melancholy austerity, which reigned among the parliamentary party.

Nevir was a quarrel more unequal than feemed at first that between the contending parties: Almost every advantage lay against the royal cause. The king's revenue had been feized, from the beginning, by the parliamen, who issued out to him, from time to time, small sums for his present subsistence; and as foon as he withdrew to York, they totally stopped all payments. London and all the feaports, except Newcastle, being in their hands, the customs yielded them a certain and considerable supply of money; and all contributions, loans, and impolitions, were more eafily raised from the cities which possessed the ready money, and where men lived under their inspection, than they could be levied by the king in those open countries, which after some time diclared for him.

THE feamen naturally followed the disposition of the fea-ports to which they belonged: And the earl of Northumberland, lord admiral, having embraced * the party of the parliament, had appointed, at their desire, the earl of Warwic to be his lieutenant, who at once established his authority in the fleet, and kept the entire dominion of the sea in the hands of that affembly.

All the magazines of arms and ammunition were from the first seized by the parliament; and their flect intercepted the greater part of those, which were sent by the queen from Holland. The king was obliged, in order to arm his followers, to borrow the weapons of the train-bands, under promife of restoring them as soon as peace should be settled in the kingdom.

THE

CHARLES 1.

THE veneration for parliaments was at this time CHAP. extreme throughout the nation". The custom of LVI. reviling those assemblies for corruption, as it had no pretence, so was it unknown, during all former Few or no instances of their encroaching ambition or felfish claims had hitherto been observed. Men confidered the house of commons in no other light than as the representatives of the nation, whose interest was the same with that of the public, who were the eternal guardians of law and liberty, and whom no motive, but the necessary defence of the people, could ever engage in an opposition to the The torrent, therefore, of general affection ran to the parliament. What is the great advantage of popularity, the privilege of affixing epithets, fell of course to that party. The king's adherents were the Wicked, and the Malignant: Their adverfaries were the Godly and Well-affected. as the force of the cities was more united than that of the country, and at once gave shelter and protection to the parliamentary party, who could eafily suppress the royalists in their neighbourhood, almost the whole kingdom, at the commencement of the war, seemed to be in the hands of the parliament ".

• What alone gave the king some compensation for all the advantages possessed by his adversaries, was the nature and qualities of his adherents. More bravery and activity were hoped for, from the generous spirit of the nobles and gentry, than from the base disposition of the multitude. And as the men of estates, at their own expence, levied and armed their tenants, besides an attachment to their masters, greater force and courage were to be expected in these rustic troops; than in the vicious and enervated populace of cities.

THE neighbouring states of Europe, being engaged in violent wars, little interested themselves in

Walker, p. 336. w Warwick, p. 318. thefe WOL. VI. K k 1642.

CHAP. these civil commotions; and this island enjoyed the fingular advantage (for fuch it furely was) of fighting out its own quarrels without the interpolition of foreigners. France, from policy, had fomented the first disorders in Scotland; had sent over arms to the Irish rebels; and continued to give countenance to the English parliament: Spain, from bigotry, furnished the Irish with some supplies of money and The prince of Orange, closely allied to the crown, encouraged English officers, who served in the Low Countries, to enlift in the king's army: The Scottish officers, who had beeen formed in Germany, and in the late commotions, chiefly took part with the parliament.

THE contempt entertained by the parliament for the king's party was so great, that it was the chief cause of pushing matters to such extremities against him; and many believed that he never would attempt resistance, but must soon yield to the pretent sions, however enormous, of the two houses. Even after his standard was crested, men could not be brought to apprehend the danger of a civil war; nor was it imagined that he would have the imprudence to enrage his implacable enemies, and render his own condition more desperate, by opposing a sorce which was so much superior. The low condition in which he appeared at Nottingham confirmed all these hopes. His artillery, though far from numerous, had been left at York, for want of horses to transport it. Besides the trained bands of the county raised by sir John Digby, the sheriff, he had not gotten together above three hundred infan-His cavalry, in which confisted his chief strength, exceeded not eight hundred, and were very ill provided wish arms. 'The forces of the parliament lay at Northampton, within a few days march of him; and consisted of above six thousand men well armed and well appointed. Had these troops advanced upon him, they must soon have diffipated dissipated the small force which he had assembled. CHAP.

By pursuing him in his retreat, they had so discredited his cause, and discouraged his adherents, as to have for ever prevented his collecting an army able to make head against them. But the earl of Effex, the parliamentary general, had not yet received any orders from his masters *. What rendered them so backward, after such precipitate steps as they had formerly taken, is not easily explained. It is probable, that in the extreme distress of his party confisted the present safety of the king. The parliament hoped, that the royalists, sensible of their feeble condition, and convinced of their slender resources, would disperse of themselves, and leave their adversaries a victory, so much the more complete and secure, as it would be gained without the appearance of force, and without bloodshed. Perhaps too, when it became necessary to make the *concluding step, and offer barefaced violence to their fovereign, their scruples and apprehensions, though not sufficient to overcome their resolutions, were able to retard the execution of them?.

SIR Jacob Astley, whom the king had appointed major-general of his intended army, told him, that he could not give him affurance but he might be ·taken out of his bed, if the rebels should make a brisk attempt to that purpose. All the king's attendants were full of well-grounded apprehensions. Some of the lords having desired that a message might be sent to the parliament with overtures to a treaty, Charles, who well knew that an accommodation, in his present condition, meant nothing but a total submission, hastily, broke up the council, lest this proposal should be farther insisted on. But next day, the earl of Southampton, whom no one could suspect of base or timid sentiments, having offered the same advice in council, it was hearkened

y Idem, ibid. p. 18. * Clarendon, vol. iii. p. x; a.

1642.

CHAP. to with more coolness and deliberation. He urged, that though such a step would probably increase the infolence of the parliament, this was so far from being an objection, that such dispositions must necessarily turn to the advantage of the royal cause: That if they refused to treat, which was more probable, the very found of peace was fo popular, that nothing could more difgust the nation than such haughty severity: That if they admitted of a treaty, their proposals, confidering their present fituation, would be so exorbitant, as to open the eyes of their most partial adherents, and turn the general favour to the king's party: And that, at worst, time might he gained by this expedient, and a delay of the imminent danger with which the king was at prefere threatened .

> CHARLES, on assembling the council, had declared against all advances towards an accommoz, dation; and had faid, that, having now nothing left him but his honour, this last possession he was refolved steadily to preserve, and rather to perish than yield any farther to the pretentions of his enemies a. But, by the unanimous defire of the counsellors, he was prevailed on to embrace Southampton's advice. That nobleman, therefore, with fir John Colepeper and fir William Uvedale, was dispatched to London, with offers of a treaty b. 'The manner in which they were received gave little hopes of success. Southampton was not allowed by the peers to take his feat; but was ordered to deliver his message to the usher, and immediately to depart the city: The commons showed little better disposition towards Colepeper and Uvedale . Both houses replied, that they could admit of no treaty with the king, till he took down his standard, and recalled his proclamations, in which the parliament supposed a Jdem, ibid.

² Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 7. E Ruflavorth, vol. v. p. 784.

c Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 10.

a fecond message, denied any such intention against the two houses; but offered to recal these proclamations, provided the parliament agreed to recal theirs, in which his adherents were declared traitors. They desired him, in return, to dismiss his forces, to reside with his parliament, and to give up delinquents to their justice; that is, abandon himself and his friends to the mercy of his enemies. Both parties slattered themselves, that, by these messages and replies, they had gained the ends which they proposed. The king believed that the people were made sufficiently sensible of the parliament's insolence and aversion to peace: The parliament intended, by this vigour in their resolutions, to support the vigour of their military operations.

THE courage of the parliament was increased, befides their great superiority of force, by two recent events, which had happened in their favour. Goring was governor of Portsnouth, the best fortified town in the kingdom, and, by its fituation, of great importance. This man feemed to have rendered himself an implacable enemy to the king, by be-traying, probably magnifying, the secret cabals of the army; and the parliament thought that his lidelity to them might, on that account, be entirely depended on. But the same levity of mind still attended him, and the same difregard to engagements and prefellions. He took underhand his measures with the court, and declared against the parliament. But, though he had been fusficiently supplied with money, and long before knew his danger, so small was his foresight, that he had left the place entirely destitute of provisions, and in a iew days he was obliged to furrender to the parliamentary forces, d Rushworth, vol. v. p. 786. Dugdale, p. 102.

"Whitlocke, p. 59.

"Rushworth, vol. v. p. 683.

Whitlocke, p. 60. Ultrendon, vol. iii. p. 19.

C H A P. LVI. 2642.

The marquis of Hertford was a nobleman of the greatest quality and character in the kingdom, and, equally with the king, descended, by a semale, from Henry VII. During the reign of James, he had attempted, without having obtained the consent of that monarch, to marry Arabella Stuart, a lady nearly related to the crown; and, upon discovery of his intentions, had been obliged, for some time, to fly the kingdom. Ever after, he was looked on with an evil eye at court, from which, in a great measure, he withdrew; and living in an independent manner, he addicted himself entirely to literary occupations and amusements. In proportion as the king declined in popularity, Hertford's character flourished with the people; and when this parliament assembled, no nobleman possessed more general favour and authority. By his fagacity, he foon perceived, that the commons, not content with correcting the abuses of government, were carried, . by the natural current of power and popularity, into the opposite extreme, and were committing violations, no less dangerous than the former, upon the English constitution. Immediately he devoted himfelf to the support of the king's falling authority, and was prevailed with to be governor to the young prince, and reside at court, to which, in the eyes of all men, he gave, by his presence, a new lustre and authority. So high was his character for mildness and humanity, that he still preserved, by means of these popular virtues, the public favour; and every one was sensible of the true motive of his change. Notwithstanding his habits of ease and study, he. now exerted himself in raising an army for the king; and being named general of the western counties, where his interest chiefly lay, he began to assemble forces in Somersetshire. By the assistance of lord Seymour, lord Paulet, John Digby, son of the earl of Bristol, sir Francis Hawley, and others, he had drawn together some appearance of an army;" when

16424

ξ̈03

when the parliament, apprehensive of the danger, CHAP. sent the earl of Bedford with a considerable force against him. On his approach, Hertford was obliged to retire into Sherborne castle; and, finding that place untenable, he himself passed over into Wales, leaving fir Ralph Hopton, fir John Berkeley, Digby, and other officers, with their horse, confisting of about a hundred and twenty, to march into Cornwal, in hopes of finding that county better prepared for their reception ⁸.

ALL the dispersed bodies of the parliamentary army were now ordered to march to Northampton; and the earl of Essex, who had joined them, found the whole amount to 15,000 men h. The king, though his camp had been gradually reinforced from all quarters, was sensible that lie had no army which could cope with so formidable a force; and he thought it prudent, by flow marches, to retire to Derby, thence to Shrewsbury, in order to countenance the levies which his friends were making in those parts. At Wellington, a day's march from Shrev sbury, he made a rendezvous of all his forces, and caused his military orders to be read at the head of every regiment. That he might bind himself by reciprocal ties, he folemnly made the following declaration before his whole army:

"I no promise, in the presence of Almighty God, " and as I hope for his bleffing and protection, that "L will, to the utmost of my power, defend and

" maintain the true reformed protestant religion, " established in the church of England, and, by the "grace of God, in the same will live and die.

• "I DESIRE that the laws may ever be the mea-" fure of my government, and that the liberty and " property of the subject may be preserved by them " with the same care as my own just rights. And [&]amp; Clarendon, vol. vi. p. 2, 3, &c.

CHAP. " if it please God, by his blessing on this army, LVI. " raised for my necessary desence, to preserve me from the present rebellion, I do solemnly and faithfully promise, in the fight of God, to main" tain the just privileges and freedom of parlia-

66 ment, and to govern, to the utmost of my power,

66 by the known statutes and customs of the king-

66 dom, and particularly to observe inviolably the " laws to which I have given my consent this par" liament. Meanwhile, if this emergence, and the " great necessity to which I am driven, beget any

"violation of law, I hope it shall be imputed by God and man to the authors of this war; not to e me, who have so earnestly laboured to preserve

" the peace of the kingdom.

" WHEN I willingly fail in these particulars, I 66 shall expect no aid or relief from man, nor any or protection from above: But in this resolution I hope for the cheerful assistance of all good men,

" and am confident of the bleffing of heaven"."

Though the concurrence of the church undoubtedly increased the king's adherents, it may safely be affirmed, that the high monarchical doctrines, so much inculcated by the clergy, had never done him any real service. The bulk of that generous train of nobility and gentry who now attended the king in his distresses, breathed the spirit of liberty, as well as of loyalty: And in the hopes alone of his submitting to a legal and limited government, were they willing, in his defence, to facrifice their lives and fortunes.

WHILE the king's army lay at Shrewsbury, and he was employing himself in collecting money, which he received, though in no great quantities, by voluntary contributions, and by the plate of the universities, which was sent him, the news arrived of an action, the first which had happened in these CHAP.F. wars, and where he was successful.

^{-!} Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 16, 17. Dugdale, p. 104.

1642.

On the appearance of commotions in England, the princes Rupert and Maurice, fons of the unfortunate Palatine, had offered their fervice to the king; and the former, at that time, commanded a body of horse, which had been sent to Worcester, in order to watch the motions of Essex, who was marching towards that city. No fooner had the prince arrived, than he faw some cavalry of the enemy approaching the gates. Without delay, he briskly attacked them, as they were defiling from a lane, and forming themselves. Colonel Sandys, who led them, and who fought with valour, being mortally wounded, fell from his horse. The whole party was routed, and was purfued above a mile. The prince, hearing of Effex's approach, returned to the main body k. This rencounter, though in itself of small importance, mightily raised the regulation of the royalists, and acquired to prince Rupert the character of promptitude and courage; qualities which he eminently displayed during the whole course of the war.

The king, on mustering his army, found it amount to 10,000 men. The earl of Lindesey, who in his youth had sought experience of military service in the Low Countries, was general: Prince Rupert commanded the horse: Sir Jacob Astley, the feot: Sir Arthur Aston, the dragoons: Sir John Heydon, the artillery. Lord Bernard Stuart was at the head of a troop of guards. The estates and revenue of this single troop, according to lord Clarendon's computation, were at least equal to those of all the members, who, at the commencement of war, voted in both houses. Their servants, under the command of sir William Killigrew, made an-

! He was then lord Willoughby.

k Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 25. May, book iii. p. 10.

" CHAP. other troop, and always marched with their mafters ".

1642.

WITH this army the king left Shrewsbury, re-12th Oct. solving to give battle as soon as possible to the army of the parliament, which, he heard, was continually augmenting by supplies from London. In order to bring on an action, he directed his march towards the capital, which, he knew, the enemy would not abandon to him. Effex had now received his instructions. The import of them was, to present a most humble petition to the king, and to rescue him and the royal family from those desperate malignants, who had seized their perions. Two days after the departure of the royalists from Shrewibury, he lest Worcester. Though it be commonly easy in civil wars to get intelligence; the armies were within fix miles of each other, ere either of the generals was acquainted with the approach of his enemy. Shrewsbury and Worcester, the places from which they set out, are not above twenty miles distant; yet had the two armies marched ten days in this mutual ignorance. So much had military skill, during a long peace, decayed in England .

Battle of Edge-hill.

23d Oft.

THE royal army lay near Banbury: That of the parliament at Keinton, in the county of Warwic. Prince Rupert sent intelligence of the enemy's ap. . proach. Though the day was far advanced, the king resolved upon the attack: Essex drew up his men to receive him. Sir Faithful Fortescue, who . had levied a troop for the Irish wars, had been obliged to serve in the parliamentary army, and was now posted on the left wing, commanded by Ramfay, a Scotchman. No fooner did the king's army approach, than Fortescue, ordering his troop to discharge their pistols in the ground, put himself under the command of prince Rupert. Partly from this [#] Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 41. Warwick, p. 231.

[&]quot; Whitlocke, p. 59. Garendon, vol. iii. p. 27, 28, &c.

Oclarendon, vol. iii. p. 44.

incident, partly from the furious shock made upon CHAP. them by the prince; that whole wing of cavalry LVI. immediately fled, and were purfued for two miles. The right wing of the parliament's army had no better success. Chased from their ground by Wilmot and fir Arthur Aston, they also took to slight. The king's body of reserve, commanded by sir John Biron, judging, like raw foldiers, that all was over, and impatient to have some share in the action, heedlessly followed the chase, which their left wing had precipitately led them. Sir William Balfour, who commanded Essex's reserve, perceived the advantage: He wheeled about upon the king's infantry, now quite unfurnished of horse; and he made great havoc among them. Lindesey, the general, was mortally wounded, and taken prisoner. His son, endeavouring his rescue, fell likewise into the enemy's hands. Sir Edmund Verney, who carried the king's standard, was killed, and the standard taken; but it was afterwards recovered. In this fituation, prince Rupert, on his return, found affairs. Every thing bore the appearance of a defeat instead of a victory, with which he had hastily flattered himself. Some advised the king to leave the field: But that prince rejected such pusillanimous counsel. The two armies faced each other for some time, and neither of them retained courage sufficient for a new attack. All night they lay under arms; and next morning found themselves in sight of each other. General, as well as foldier, on both fides, seemed averse to renew the battle. Essex first drew off, and retired to Warwic. The king returned to his former quarters. Five thousand men are said to have been found dead on the field of battle; and the loss of the two armies, as far as we can judge by the opposite accounts, was nearly equal. Such was the event of this first battle, fought at Keinton, or Edge-hill p.

Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 44, &c. May, book iii. p. 16, &c.

₹

CHAP.

Some of Essex's horse, who had been driven off the sield in the beginning of the action, slying to a great distance, carried news of a total defeat, and struck a mighty terror into the city and parliament. After a few days, a more just account arrived; and then the parliament pretended to a complete victory. The king also, on his part, was not wanting to display his advantages; though, except the taking of Banbury, a few days after, he had sew marks of victory to boast of. He continued his march, and took possession of Oxford, the only town in his dominions which was altogether at his devotion.

AFTER the royal army was recruited and refreshed; as the weather still continued favourable, it was again put in motion. A party of horse approached to Reading, of which Martin was appointed governor by the parliament. Both governor and garrison were feized with a panic, and fled with precipitation to London. The king, hoping that every thing * would yield before him, advanced with his whole army to Reading. The parliament, who, instead. of their fond expectations, that Charles would never be able to collect an army, had now the prospect of a civil war, bloody, and of uncertain event; were farther alarmed at the near approach of the royal army, while their own forces lay at a distance. They voted an address for a treaty. The king's nearer approach to Colebroke quickened their advances for peace. Northumberland and Pembroke, with three commoners, presented the address of both houses; in which they befought his majesty to appoint some convenient place where he might refide till committees could attend him with proposals. The king named Windsor, and desired that their garrison might be removed, and his own troops admitted into that castle.

⁹ Whitlocke, p. 67. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 59.

MEANWHILE Essex, advancing by hasty marches, CHAP. had arrived at London. But neither the presence of his army, nor the precarious hopes of a treaty, retarded the king's approaches. Charles attacked, 30th Noat Brentford, two regiments quartered there, and after a sharp action beat them from that village, and took about 500 prisoners. The parliament had fent orders to forbear all hostilities, and had expected the fame from the king; though no flipulations to that purpose had been mentioned by their commissioners. Loud complaints were raited against this attack, as if it had been the most apparent perfidy, and breach of treaty. Inflamed with resentment, as well as anxious for its own fafety, the city marched its trained bands in excellent order, and joined the army under Effex. The parliamentary army now amounted to above 21.000 men, and was much superior to that of the king '. After both armies had faced each other for some time, Charles drew off and retired to Reading, thence to Oxford.

While the principal armies on both fides were kept in inaction by the winter feason, the king and parliament were employed in real preparations for war, and in seeming advances towards peace. By means of contributions or assessments, levied by the horse, Charles maintained his cavalry: By loans and voluntary presents, sent him from all parts of the kingdom, he supported his infantry: But the supplies were still very unequal to the necessities under which he laboured. The parliament had much greater resources for money; and had, by consequence, every military preparation in much greater order and abundance. Besides an imposition levied in London, amounting to the five-and-twentieth part of every one's substance, they established on

" * Whitlocke, p. 62. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 75.

Whitlocke, p. 62. "Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 87.

CHAP that city a weekly affestment of 10,000 pounds, and another of 23,518, on the rest of the kingdom w. And as their authority was at present established in most counties, they levied these taxes with regularity; though they amounted to sums much greater than the nation had formerly paid to the public.

1643.

Negotiation at Oxioid,

THE king and parliament fent reciprocally their demands; and a treaty commenced, but without any cessation of hostilities, as had at first been proposed. The earl of Northumberland, and four members of the lower house, came to Oxford as commissioners *. In this treaty the king perpetuaally infifted on the re-establishment of the crown in its legal powers, and on the restoration of his constitutional prerogative : The parliament still required new concessions, and a farther abridgment of regal authority, as a more effectual remedy to their fears and jealousies. Finding the king supported by more forces, and a greater party than they had ever looked for, they feemingly abated somewhat of those extravagant conditions which they had formerly claimed; but their demands were still too high for an equal treaty. Besides other articles, to which a complete victory alone could . entitle them, they required the king in express terms utterly to abolish episcopacy; a demand which, before, they had only infinuated: And they required, that all other ecclesiastical controversies should be determined by their assembly of divines; that is, in the manner the most repugnant to the inclinations of the king and all his partisans. They insisted, that he should submit to the punishment of his most " faithful adherents. And they defired him to acquiesce in their settlement of the militia, and to confer on their adherents the entire power of the w Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 171.

^{*} Whitlocke, p. 64-

fword. In answer to the king's proposal, that his CHAP. magazines, towns, forts, and ships, should be restored to him, the parliament required, that they stored to him, the parliament required, that they should be put into such hands as they could confide in 2: The nineteen propositions, which they formerly fent to the king, shewed their inclination to abolish monarchy: They only asked, at present, the power of doing it. And having now, in the eye of the law, been guilty of treason, by levying war against their sovereign; it is evident that their fears and jealousies must, on that account, have multiplied extremely; and have rendered their personal safety, which they interwove with the fafety of the nation, stillemore incompatible with the authority of the monarch. Though the gentleness and lenity of the king's temper might have enfured them against schemes of future vengeance; they preferred, as is, no doubt, natural, an independent fecurity, accompanied too with sovereign power, to the station of subjects, and that not entirely guarded from all apprehenfions of danger 's

The conferences went no farther than the first demand on each fide. The parliament, finding that there was no likelihood of coming to any agreement, suddenly recalled their commis-dioners.

A MILITARY enterprise, which they had concerted early in the spring, was immediately undertaken. Reading, the garrison of the king's which lay nearest to London, was esteemed a place of considerable strength in that age, when the art of attacking towns was not well understood in Europe, and was totally unknown in England. The earl of Essex sat down before this place with an army April 15. of 18,000 men; and carried on the siege by regular approaches. Sir Arthur Aston, the gover-

* See note [PP] at the end of the volume.

Rushworth, vol. vi. p. 166. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 119.

the command. In a little time the town was found to be no longer in a condition of defence; and though the king approached, with an intention of obliging Effex to raise the fiege, the disposition of the parliamentary army was so strong, as rendered the design impracticable. Fielding, therefore, was contented to yield the town, on condition that he should bring off all the garrison with the honours of war, and deliver up deserters. This last article was thought so ignominious and so prejudicial to the king's interests, that the governor was tried by a council of war, and condemned to lose his life, for Essex's army had been fully supplied with all necessaries from London: Even many superfluities and luxuries were sent them by the care of the zealous citizens: Yet the hardships, which they suffered from the siege, during so early a season, had weakened them to such a degree, that they were no longer sit for any new enterprise. And the two armies, for some time, encamped in the neighbourhood of each other, without attempting, on either consenting to it. His sentence was afterwards refide, any action of moment.

Besides the military operations between the principal armies, which lay in the centre of England; each county, each town, each family almost, was divided within itself; and the most violent convulsions shook the whole kingdom. Throughout the winter, continual efforts had every-where been made by each party to surmount its antagonist; and the English, roused from the lethargy of peace, with eager, though unskilful hands, employed against their fellow-citizens their long-neglected weapons. The furious zeal for liberty and b Rushworth, vol. vi. p. 265, &c. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 237, 38, &c.

profibyterian discipline, which had hitherto run un C II A.P. controlled throughout the nation, now at last excited an equal ardor for monarchy and episcopacy; when the intention of abolishing these ancient modes of government was openly avowed by the parliament. Conventions for neutrality, though in feveral counties they had been entered into, and confirmed by the most solemn oaths, yet, being voted illegal by the two houses, were immediately broken; and the fire of discord was spread into every quarter. The altercation of discourse, the controversies of the pen, but, above ali, the declamations of the pulpit, indisposed the minds of men towards each other, and propagated the blind rage of party . Fierce, however, and inflamed as were the dispositions of the English, by a war both civil and religious, that great destroyer of humanity; all the events of this period are less distinguished · by atrocious deeds either of treachery or cruelty, than were ever any intestine discords, which had fo long a continuance. • A circumstance which will be found to reflect great praise on the national character of that people, now so unhappilly reused to arms.

In the north, lord Fairfax commanded for the parliament, the earl of Newcaitle for the king. The latter nobleman began those associations which were asterwards so much practised in other parts of the kingdom. He united in a league for the king the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and the Bishopric, and engaged, some time after, other counties in the same association. Finding that Fairfax, assisted by Hotham and the garrison of Hull, was making progress in the southern parts of Yorkshire; he advanced with a body of four thousand men, and took possession

Clarendon, vol. iii. p. x37. x39.

Vol. VI.

Ll

of

the parliament, and dislodged them: But his victory was not decisive. In other rencounters he obtained some inconsiderable advantages. But the chief benefit which resulted from his enterprises was, the establishing of the king's authority in all the northern provinces.

In another part of the kingdom, lord Broke was killed by a shot, while he was taking possession of Litchfield for the parliament. After a short combat, near Stassord, between the earl of Northampton and sir John Gell, the former, who commanded the king's forces, was killed, while he fought with great valous, and his forces, discouraged by his death, though they had obtained the advantage in the action, tretreated into the town of Stassord.

SIR William Waller began to distinguish himself among the generals of the parliament. Active and indefatigable in his operations, rapid and enterprising; he was fitted by his genius to the nature of the war; which, being managed by raw troops, conducted by unexperienced commanders, aborded success to every bold and sudden undertaking. After taking Winchester and Chichester, he advanced towards Glocester, which was in a mannel blockaded by lord Herbert, who had levied considerable forces in Wales for the royal party. While he attacked the Welsh on one tider a fally from Glocester made impression on the other.

p. 151. 2 Ruthe vol. vi. p. 152. Clatendon, vol. in window St. Chad's cathedral, in which a party of the royant's had fortified themselves. He was cased in complete armout, but was shot through the eye by a random ball. Lord Broke was a zealous puritan; and had formerly said, that he hoped to see with his eye the ruin of all the cathedrals of England. It was a superstitution remark of the royalitts, that he was killed on St. Chad's day by a fnot from St. Chad's cathedral, which pieced that very eye by which he hoped to see the ruin of all cathedrals. Dugdale, p. 118. Clarendon, &c.

Flerbert was defeated; five hundred of his men CHAP. Killed on the spot; a thousand taken prisoners; and he himself escaped with some difficulty to Oxford. Hereford, esteemed a strong town, defended by a considerable garrison, was surrendered to Waller, from the cowardice of colonel Price the governor. Tewkesbury underwent the same fate. Worcester refused him admittance; and Waller, without placing any garrisons in his new conquests, retired to Glocester, and he thence joined the army under the earl of Effex b.

Bur the most remarkable actions of valour, dur- victories ing this winter-featon, were performed in the west. of the toy-When fir Ralph Hopton, with his finall troop, re- west. tired into Cornwall before the carl of Bedford, that nobleman, despising so inconsiderable a force, abandoned the pursuit, and committed the care of suppressing the royal party to the sheriffs of the county. But the affections of Cornwall were much inclined to'. the king's service. While fir Richard Buller and fir Alexander Carew lay as Launceston, and employed themselves in executing the parliament's ordinance for the militia, a meeting of the county was assembled at Truro; and after Hopton produced his commission from the earl of Hertford, the king's general, it was agreed to execute the laws, and to expel these invaders of the county. The train-bands were accordingly levied, Launceston *taken, and all Cornwall reduced to peace and to obedience under the king.

Ir had been usual for the royal party, on the commencement of these disorders, to claim, on all occasions, the strict execution of the laws, which they knew were favourable to them; and the parliament, rather than have recourse to the plea of necessity, and avow the transgression of any statute,

4 Rush, vol. vi. p. 263.

E HAP. had also been accustomed to warp the laws, and by interpret them in their own. favour'. But though the king was naturally the gainer by fuch a method of conducting war, and it was by favour of law that the train-bands /were raifed in Cornwall; it appeared that those maxims were now prejudicial to the royal party. These troops could not legally, without their own confent, be carried out of the county; and consequently, it was impossible to push into Devonshire the advantage which they had obtained. The Cornish royalills, therefore, bethought themselves of levying a force which might be more serviceable. 'Sir Bevil Granville, the most beloved man of that country, hr Ralph Hopton, fir Nicholas Slanning, Arundel, and Trevannian, undertook, at their own charges, to raise an army for the king; and their great interest in Cornwall soon enabled them to essect their purpose. The parliament, alarmed at this appearance of the royalists, gave a commission to Ruthven, a Scotchman, governor of Plymouth, to march with all the forces of Dorset, Somerset, and Dcvon, and make an entire conquest of Cornwall. The earl of Stamford followed him at some disrance with a confiderable supply. Ruthven, having entered Cornwall by bridges thrown over the Ta-. mar, hastened to an action; lest Stamford should join him, and obtain the honour of that victory which he looked for with affurance. The royaline, in like manner, were impatient to bring the affair to a decision before Ruthven's army should receive to confiderable a reinforcement. The battle was fought on Bradoc Down; and the king's forces, though inferior in number, gave a total defeat to their enemies. Ruthven, with a few broken troops, fled to Saltash; and when that town was taken, he escaped, with some difficulty, and almost alone, into Elarendon, vol. iii. p. 130.

Plymouth. Stamford retired, and distributed his CHAPA fosces into Plymouth and Exeter.

Norwithstanding these advantages, the extreme want both of money and ammunition under which the Cornilli royalids laboured, obliged them to enter into a convention of neutrality with the parliamentary party in Devonthire; and this neutrality held all the winter-feafon. In the spring it was broken by the authority of the two houses; and war recommenced with great appearance of disadvantage to the king's party. Stamford, having assembled a flrong body of near feven thousand men, well supplied with money, provisions, and ammunition, advanced upon the royalists, who were not half his number, and were oppressed by every kind of necessity. Despair, joined to the natural gallantry of Battle of these troops, commanded by the prime gentry of May 16th, the county, made them resolve, by one vigorous effort, to overcome all these disadvantages. Stamford being encamped on the top of a high hill near Stratton, they attacked him in four divisions, at ave in the morning, having lain all night under One division was commanded by lord Mohun and fir Ralph Hopton, another by fir Bevil Granville and fir John Berkeley, a third by Slanning and Trevannion, a fourth by Basset and Godolphin. In this mainer the action began; the king's forces pressing with vigour those four ways up the hill, and their enemies obstinately defending themselves. The fight continued with doubtful fuccess, till word was brought to the chief officers of the Cornill, that their animunition was spent to less than four barrels of powder. This descet, which they concealed from the foldiers, they refolved to supply by their valour. They agreed to advance without firing till they should reach the top · of the hill, and could be on equal ground with the enemy. The courage of the officers was so well feconded Ll₃.

G. II A P. seconded by the soldiers, that the royalists began in all sides to gain ground. Major-general Chidley, who commanded the parliamentary army, (for Stamford kept at a distance) failed not in his duty; and when he faw his men recoil, he himfelf advanced with a good fland of pikes, and piercing into the thickest of the enemy, was at last overpowered by numbers, and taken prifoner. His army, upon this disaster, gave ground apace; insomuch that the four parties of the royalists; growing nearer and nearer as they ascended, at length met together upon the plain at the top; where they embraced ... with great joy; and fignalized their victory with loud shouts and mutual congratulations k.

AFTER this fuccess, the attention both of king and parliament was turned towards the welt, as to a very important scene of action. The king sent thither the marquis of Hertford and prince Maurice with a reinforcement of cavalry; who having joined the Cornish army, soon over-ran the county of Devon; and advancing into that of Somerfet, began to reduce it to obedience. On the other hand, the parliament having supplied sir William Waller, in whom they much trusted, with a complete army, dispatched him westwards, in order to check the progress of the royalists. After some skirmishes, the two armies met at Lanksown, near Bath, and fought a pitched battle, with great loss on both fides, but without any decifive event. The gallant Granville was there killed; and Hopton, by the blowing up of some powder, was dangeroully hurt. The royalists next attempted to march eastwards,. and to join their forces to the king's at Oxford: But Waller hung on their rear, and infelted their Reinforced march till they reached the Devizes.

Battle of Lanfdown. 5th July.

I Rush. vol. vi. p. 284. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 282.

^{*} Rolli, vol. vi. p. 267 273. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 269: 279.

by additional troops, which flocked to him from all CHAP. quarters, he so much surpaised the royalis in number, that they durit no longer continue their maich, or expose themselves to the hazard of an action. It was refolved, that Hertford and prince Maurice should proceed with the cavalry; and having procured a reinforcement from the king, flould hasten back to the relief of their friends. Waller was to confident of taking this body of infantry, now abandoned by the horse, that he wrote to the parliament, that their work was done, and that by the next post he would inform them of the number and quality of the priloners. But the king, even before Hertford's arrival, hearing of the great difficulties to which his western army was reduced, had prepared a confiderable body of cavalry, which he immediately dispatched to their succour under the command of lord Wilmot. Waller drew up on Banko of *Roundway-down, about two miles from the Devi-Round-zes; and advancing with his cavalry to fight Wil-down. mor, and prevent his conjunction with the Cornish 13th July. infantry, was received with equal valour by the royaliss. After a sharp action he was totally routed, and flying with a few horse, escaped to Bristol. Wilmot, feizing the enemy's cannon, and having ioined his friends, whom he came to relieve, attacked Waller's infantry with redoubled courage, drove them off the field, and routed and disperied the whole army in.

2643.

This important victory following fo quick after many other successes, struck great dismay into the parliament, and gave an alarm to their principal army commanded by Essex. Waller exclaimed loudly against that general, for allowing Wilmot to pass him, and proceed without any interraption to the succour of the distressed infantry at the Devizes.

m'Rush, vol. vi. p. 285. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 294.

CHAP.

Essex, discouraged by this event, dismayed by the total rout of Waller, was farther informed, that the queen, who landed in Burington-bay, had arrived at Oxford, and had brought from the north a reinforcement of three thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse. Dislodging from Thame and Aylesbury, where he had hitherto lain, he thought proper to retreat meater to London, and he shewed to his friends his broken and dilheartened forces, which a few months before he had led into the field in fo flourishing a condition. The king, freed from this enemy; sent his army westward under prince Rupert, and, by their conjunction with the Cornish troops, a formidable force, for numbers as well as reputation and valour, was composed. That an enterprife, correspondent to men's expectations, might be undertaken, the prince resolved to lay siege to Bristol, the second town for riches and greatness in the kingdom. Nathaniel Fiennes, fon of lord -Say, he himself, 'as well as his father, a great parliamentary leader, was governor, and commanded a garriton of two thousand five hundred foot, and two regiments, one of horse, another of dragoous. The fortifications not being complete or regular, it was resolved by prince Rupert to storm the city; and next morning, with little other provisions suitable. to fuch a work, besides the courage of the troops, the affault began. The Cornish, in three divisions, attacked the west side, with a resolution which no... thing could control: But though the middle division had already mounted the wall, so great was the disadvantage of the ground, and so brave the defence of the garrison, that in the end the affailants were • pulfed with a confiderable loss both of officers and foldiers. On the prince's fide, the affault was conducted with equal courage, and almost with equal loss, but with better success. party, led by lord Grandison, was indeed beaten off, off, and the commander himself mortally wounded: CHAP. inother, conducted by colonel Bellasis, met with a like fate: But Washington, with a less party, finding a place in the curtain weaker than the rest, broka in, and quickly intele room for the horse to follow. By this irruption, however, nothing but the fuburbs was yet gained: The entrance into the town was still more difficult: And by the loss already fullained, as well as by the prospect of farther danger, every one was extremely discouraged: When, to the great joy of the army, the city beat Bristot a parley. The garrison was allowed to march out taken. with their arms and baggage, leaving their cannon, 25th July. ammunition, and colours. For this instance of cowardice, Fiennes was afterwards tried by a courtmarrial, and condemned to lofe his head; but the fentence was remitted by the general.

13

GREAT complaints were made of violences exercifed on the garrison, contrary to the capitulation. An apology was made by the royalists, as if these were a retaliation for some violences committed on their friends at the furrender of Reading. And under pretence of like retaliations, but really from the extreme animofity of the parties, were such irregularities continued during the whole course of the war 1.

THE loss sustained by the royalists, in the assault of Bristol, was considerable. Five hundred excellent foldiers perished. Among those of condition were Grandison, Slanning, Trevannion, and Moyle: Bellasis, Ashley, and sir John Owen, were wounded: Yet was the fuccess, upon the whole, so considerable, as mightily raised the courage of the one party, and depressed that of the other. The king, to show that he was not intoxicated with good fortune, nor aspired to a total victory over the parliament,

4 Clarendon, ubi supra, p. 297.

P Rushworth, vol. vi. p. 284. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 293, 294, &c.

CHAP. Fament, published a manisesto; in which he re ed the protesiation, formerly taken, with great solemnity, at the head of his army, and expressed his term intention of making peace upon the re-ellablishment of the constitution. Having joined the Ampp at Brittol, and fent prince Maurice with a detachment into Devonihire, he deliberated how to employ the remaining forces in an enterprile of mo-Some, proposed, and seemingly with reafon, to march directly to London: where every thing was in confution, where the army of the parkiament was baffled, weakened, and difmayed, and where, it was hoped, either by an inturrection of the citizens, by victors, or by treaty, a speedy end might be put to the civil dhorders. But this undertaking, by reason of the great number and force of the London militia, was thought by many to be attended with confiderable difficulties. Glocester. lying within twenty miles, presented an easier, yet a very important conquest. It was the only remaining garrison possessed by the parliament in those parts. Could that city be reduced, the king held the whole course of the Severn under his command; the rich and malcontent counties of the west, having lost all protection from their friends, might be forced to pay high contributions, as an atonement. for their disaffection; an open communication could be preserved between Walcs and these new conquests; and half of the kingdom, being entirely freed from the enemy, and thus united into one firm body, might be employed in re-establishing the king's authority throughout the remainder. These were the reasons for embracing that resolution; fatal as it was ever esteemed, to the royal party .

THE governor of Glocester was one Massey, a iege of ducetter. soldier of fortune, who, before he engaged with the parliament, had offered his fervice to the king; CHAP. and as he was free from the fumes of enthusiasm, LVI. by which most of the officers on that side were intoxicated, he would lend an ear, it was presumed, to prapolals for accommodation: But Massey was resolute to preserve an entire sidelity to his masters; and though no enthusiait himself, he well knew how to employ to advantage that enthufiastic spirit so prevalent in his city and garrison. The fummons toth Aug. to furrender allowed two hours for an answer: But before that time expired, there appeared before the king two citizens, with lean, pale, sharp, and difmal vilages: Faces, lo strange and uncouth, according to lord Clarencon; figures, so habited and accourred, as at once moved the most severe countenance to mirth, and the most cheerful heart to sadneis: It seemed impossible, that such messengers could bring less than a defiance. The men, without any circumstance of duty or good manners, in a pert, shrill, undismayed accent, said, that they brought an answer from the godly city of Glocester : And extremely ready were they, according to the historian, to give insolent and sedifous replies to any queltion; as if their business were chiefly, by * provoking the king, to make him violate his own . Tale-conduct, The answer from the city was in these words: "We, the inhabitants, magistrates, " offerers and foldiers, within the garrison of Glo-.20 cester, unto his majelly's gracious message " return this humble answer: That we do keep " this city according to our oaths and allegiance, to and for the use of his majesty, and of his royal " " posterity: And do accordingly conceive our-" selves wholly bound to obey the commands of "his majesty, signified by both houses of parlia-" ment: And are resolved, by God's help, to keep "this city accordingly"." After these prelimina-

Whitlocke, p. 69. May, book in. p. 91.

⁸ Rushworth, vol. vi. p. 387. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 315. May, book m. p. 96.

CHAP ries, the siege was resolutely undertaken by the LVI. army, and as resolutely sustained by the citizens and garrison.

WHEN intelligence of the siege of Glocesfer arrived in London, the consternation among the inhabitants was as great as if the enemy were already at their gates. The rapid progress of the royalists threatened the parliament with immediate subjection: The factions and discontents among themselves, in the city, and throughout the neighbouring counties, prognosticated some dangerous division or insurrection. Those parliamentary leaders, it must be owned, who had introduced fuch mighty innovations in the English constitution, and who had projected fo much greater, had not engaged in an enterprise which exceeded their courage and capacity. Great vigour, from the beginning, as well as wisdom, they had displayed in all their counsels; and a furious, headstrong body, broken loose from the restraint of law, had hitherto been retained in -fubjection under their authority, and firmly united by zeal and passion, as by the most legal and established government. A small committee, on whom the two houses devolved their power, had directed all their military operations, and had preferved a secrecy in deliberation, and a promptitude in execution, beyond what the king, notwithlanding the advantages possessed by a single leader, had ever been able to attain. Schfible that no jealoufy was by their partifans entertained against them, they had on all occasions exerted an authority much more despotic than the royalists, even during the pressing exigencies of war, could with patience endure in their fovereign. Whoever incurred their displeasure, or was exposed to their suspicions, was committed to priton, and profecuted under the notion of delinquency: After all the old jails were full, many new ones were erecled; and even the ships were crowded with the royalists, both gentry and . clergy, clergy, who languished below decks, and perished in those unhealthy confinements: They imposed taxes, the heaviest, and of the most unusual nature, by an ordinance of the two houses: They voted a commission for sequestrations; and they seized, whereever they had power, the revenues of all the king's party': And knowing that themselves, and all their adherents, were, by resisting the prince, exposed to the penalties of laws, they resolved, by a severe administration, to overcome these terrors, and to retain the people in obedience, by penalties of a more immediate execution. In the beginning of this summer, a combination, formed against them in London, had obliged them to exert the plenitude of their authority.

EDMUND WALLER, the first refiner of English versification, was a member of the lower house; a man of confiderable fortune, and not more diffinguished by his poetical genius than by his parliamentry talents, and by the politeness and elegance of his manners. As full of keen fatire and invective in his eloquence, as of tendernels and panegyric in his poetry, he caught the attention of his hearers, and exerted the utmost boldness in blaming those violent counsels, by which the commons were goexerned. Finding all opposition within doors to be fruitless, he endeavoured to form a party without, which might oblige the parliament to accept of rea--sonable conditions, and restore peace to the nation. The charms of his conversation, joined to his character of courage and integrity, had procured him the entire confidence of Northumberland, Conway, and every eminent person of either sex, who resided in London. They opened their breasts to him without referve, and expressed their disapprobation of the furious measures pursued by the commons, and t The king afterwards copied from this example; but, as the far greater part of the nobility and landed gentry were his friends, he semped much less profit from this measure.

Their

CHAP their wishes that some expedient could be found for stopping so impetuous a career. Tomkins, Waller's brother-in-law, and Chaloner, the intimate friend of Tomkins, had entertained like fentiments: And as the connexions of these two gentlemen lay chiefly in the city, they informed Waller, that the lame abhorrence of war prevailed there, among all men of reason and moderation. Upon reflection it seemed not impracticable, that a combination might be formed between the lords and citizens; and, by mutual concert, the illegal taxes be refused, which the parliament, without the royal affent, imposed on the people. While this affair was in agitation, and lifts were making of fuch as they conceived to be well affected to their defign; a fervant of Tomkins, who had overheard their discourse, immediately carried intelliance to Pym. Waller, Tomkins, and Chaloner were feized, and tried by a court-martial. They were all three condemned, and the two latter exccated on gibbets acrected before their own doors. A covenant, as a test, was taken by the lords and. commons, and imposed on their army, and on all who lived within their quarters. Besides resolving to amend and reform their lives, the covenanters there vow, that they will never lay down their arms to long as the papills, now in open war against the parliament, shall, by force of arms, be protected from justice; they express their abhorrence of the. late confpiracy; and they promife to affift to the utmost the forces raised by both houses, against the forces levied by the king 4.

WALLER, as foon as imprisoned, sensible of the great danger into which he had fallen, was so seized with the dread of death, that all his sormer spirit [&]quot; Rufhwarth, voi. vi. p. 326. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 249, 250, &c.

^{* 6}th of June. c Rushworth, vol. vi. p. 325. Ciarchidon, vol. ii. p. 255.

deserted him; and he confessed whatever he knew C H A P. uithout sparing his most intimate friends, without regard to the confidence reposed in him, without distinguishing between the negligence of familiar conversation, and the schemes of a regular conspiracy. With the most profound dissimulation, he counterfeited such remorse of conscience, that his execution was put off, out of mere christian compassion, till he might recover the use of his understanding. He invited visits from the ruling clergy of all fects; and while he expressed his own penitence, he received their devout exhortations with humility and reverence, as conveying clearer conviction and information than in his life he had ever before attained. Presents too, of which, as well as of flattery, these holy men were not insensible, were distributed among them; as a small retribution for their prayers and gholtly counsel. And by all these artifices, more than from any regard to the beauty of his genius, of which, during that time of furious cant and faction, small account would be made, he prevailed so far as to have his life spared, and a fine of ten thousand pounds accepted in lieu of it y.

THE severity exercised against the conspiracy, or , rather project, of Waller, increased the authority of the parliament, and seemed to ensure them against like attempts for the future. But by the progress of the king's arms, the defeat of sir William Walier, the taking of Bristol, the siege of Glocester, a cry for peace was renewed, and with more violence then ever. Crowds of women, with a petition for that purpose, slocked about the house, and were so clamorous and importunate, that orders were given for dispersing them; and some of the females were killed in the fray. Bedford, Hol-' land, and Conway had deserted the parliament, and had gone to Oxford; Clare and Lovelace had Rusworth, vol. vi. p. 330. Clarendon, Whitlocke, p. 66. Rushworth, vol. vi. p. 357. vol. iii. p. 253, 254, &c.

CHAP followed them a. Northumberland had retired to his country-seat: Essex himself shewed extreme diffatisfaction, and exhorted the parliament to make peace b. The upper house sent down terms of accommodation, more moderate than had himertobeen infisted on. It even passed by a majority among the commons, that these proposals should be transmitted to the king. The zealots took the alarm. A petition against peace was framed in the city, and presented by Pennington, the factious mayor. Multitudes attended him, and renewed all the former menaces against the moderate party. The pulpits thundered, and rumours were spread of twenty thousand Irish, who had landed, and were to cut the throat of every protestant d. The majority was again turned to the other fide; and all thoughts of pacification being dropped, every preparation was made for resistance, and for the immediate relief of Glocester, on which the parliament was sensible all their hopes of success in the war did fo much depend.

Massey, resolute to make a vigorous desence, and having under his command a city and garrison ambitious of the crown of martyrdom, had hitherto maintained the siege with courage and abilities, and . had much retarded the advances of the king's army. By continual sallies, he infested them in their tren- ' ches, and gained sudden advantages over them: By disputing every inch of ground, he repressed the vigour and alacrity of their courage, clated by former successes. His garrison, however, was reduced to the last extremity; and he failed not, from time to time, to inform the parliament, that, unless. speedily relieved, he should be necessitated, from the extreme want of provisions and ammunition, to open his gates to the enemy.

[#] Whitlocke, p. 67.

Idem. ibid. p. 356. Ruth. vol. vi. p. 588.

[•] Rush. vol. vi. p. 290.

^{4.} Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 520.

THE parliament, in order to repair their broken C HAP. condition, and put themselves in a posture of defence, now exerted to the utmost their power and authority. They voted that an army should be levied under sir William Waller, whom, notwithstanding his missortunes, they loaded with extraordinary caresses. Having associated in their cause the counties of Heriford, Effex, Cambridge, Norfolk, Suffolk, Lincoln, and Huntingdon, they gave the earl of Marchester a commission to be general of the affociation, and appointed an army to he levied under his command. But, above all, they were intent that Essex's army, on which their whole fortune depended, should be put in a condition of marching against the king. They excited afresh their preachers to surious declamations against the royal cause. They even employed the expedient of pressing, though abolished by a late law, for which they had strenuously contended. And they engaged the city to send four regiments of its militia to the relief of Glocester. All shops, meanwhile, were ordered to be shut; and every man expected, with the utmost anxiety, the event of that important enterprise.

Essex, carrying with him a well-appointed army of 14,000 men, took the road of Bedford and Leicester; and though inferior in cavalry, yet by the mere force of conduct and discipline, he passed over Hirfe open champaign countries, and defended himself from the enemies horse, who had advanced to meet him, and who infelted him during his whole march-As he approached to Glocester, the king was obliged to raise the siege, and open the way for Essex to enter that city. The necessities of the garrison were extreme. One barrel of powder was their whole stock of ammunition remaining; and their other provisions were in the same proportion. Essex had brought with him military stores; and the

Kuih. vol. vi. p. 292.

f Idem, ibid.

C II A P. neighbouring country abundantly supplied him with victuals of every kind. The inhabitants had carefully concealed all provisions from the king's army, and pretending to be quite exhausted, had reserved their stores for that cause which they so much favoured g.

THE chief difficulty still remained. Essex dreaded a battle with the king's army, on account of its great superiority in cavalry; and he resolved to return, if possible, without running that hazard. He lay five days at Tewkelbury, which was his first stage after leaving Glocester; and he feigned, by some preparations, to point towards Worcester. By a forced march during the night, he reached Cirencester, and obtained the double advantage of pailing unmolested an open country, and of surprising a convoy of provisions which lay in that town h. Without delay he proceeded towards London; but when he reached Newbury, he was surprised to find that the king, by hasty marches, had arrived before him, and was already possessed of the place.

20th Sept.

Rattle of Newbury.

An action was now unavoidable; and Essexprepared for it with presence of mind, and not without military conduct. On both sides, the battle was fought with desperate valour and a steady bravery. Essex's horse were several times broken by the king's, but his infantry maintained themselves in firm array; and, besides giving a continued sire, they presented an invincible rampart of pikes against. the furious shock of prince Rupert, and those gallant troops of gentry, of which the royal cavalry was chiefly composed. The militia of London especially, though utterly unacquainted with action, ' though drawn but a few days before from their ordinary occupations, yet having learned all military exercises, and being animated with unconquerable zeal for the cause in which they were engaged, k Rush, vol. vi. p. 292.

E Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 344.

equalled, on this occasion, what could be expected CHAP. from the most veteran forces. While the armies were engaged with the utmost ardour, night put an end to the action, and left the victory undecided. Next morning, Essex proceeded on his march; and though his rear was once put in some disorder by an incursion of the king's horse, he reached London in fafety, and received applause for his conduct and succels in the whole enterprise. The king foilowed him on his march; and having taken possession of Reading, after the earl left it, he there established a garrison; and straitened, by that means, London, and the quarters of the enemy i.

1643.

In the battle of Newbury, on the part of the king, besides the earls of Sunderland and Carnarvon, two noblemen of promising hopes, were unfortunately slain, to the regret of every lover of ingenuity and virtue throughout the kingdom, Lucious Cary, Viscount Falkland, secretary of state. Before assembling the present parliament, this man, devoted to the pursuits of learning, and to the society of all the polite and elegant, had enjoyed himself in every pleasure, which a fine genius, a generous disposition, and an opulent fortune could Called into public life, he stood foremost in all attacks on the high prerogatives of the crown; and displayed that masculine eloquence, and undaunged love of liberty, which, from his intimate equaintance with the sublime spirits of antiquity, he had greedily imbibed. When civil convulsions. proceeded to extremities, and it became requisite for him to chuse his side; he tempered the ardour of his zeal, and embraced the defence of those limited powers which remained to monarchy, and which he deemed necessary for the support of the English constitution. Still anxious, however, for his country, he seems to have dreaded the too pro-

¹ Rush. vol. vi. p. 293. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 347. Mm3. sperous

LVI. 1643.

C H A P. sperous success of his own party as much as of the enemy; and, among his intimate friends, often, after a deep filence and frequent fighs, he would; with a sad accent, reiterate the word Peace. In excule for the too free exposing of his person, which seemed unsuitable in a secretary of state, he alleged, that it became him to be more active than other men in all hazardous enterprises, lest his impatience for peace might bear the imputation of cowardice or putillanimity. From the commenceinent of the war, his natural cheerfulness and vivacity became clouded; and even his usual attention to dress, required by his birth and station, gave way to a negligence which was easily observable. On the morning of the battle in which he fell, he had shown some care of adorning his person; and gave for a reason, that the enemy should not find his body in any flovenly, indecent fituation. " am weary," subjoined he, " of the times, and foresee much misery to my country; but be-" lieve, that I shall be out of it ere night's." This excellent person was but thirty-four years of age when a period was thus put to his life.

THE loss sustained on both sides in the battle of Newbury, and the advanced season, obliged the armies to retire into winter quarters.

Actions in the north.

In the north, during this fummer, the great interest and popularity of the earl, now created anarquis of Newcastle, had raised a considerable force. for the king; and great hopes of success were entertained from that quarter. There appeared, however, in opposition to him, two men, on whom the event of the war finally depended, and who began about this time to be remarked for their valour and military conduct. These were sir Thomas Fairfax, son of the lord of that name, and Oliver Cromwel.

^{*} Whitlocke, p. 70. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 350, 351, &c.

The former gained a considerable advantage at C H'A P. Wakesield over a detachment of royalists, and took general Goring prisoner; the latter obtained 1613. a violtory at Gainsborow over a party commanded by the gallant Cavendish, who perished in the action. But both these defeats of the royalists were more than fufficiently compensated by the total rout of lord Fairfax at Atherton moor", and the difpersion of his army. 'After this victory, Newcastle, with an army of 15,000 men, sat down before Hull. Hotham was no longer governor of this place. That gentleman and his fon, partly from a jealousy entertained of lord Fairfax, partly repenting of their engagements against the king, had entered into a correspondence with Newcastle, and had expressed an intention of delivering Hull into his hands. But their conspiracy being detected, they were arrested and fent prisoners to London; where, without any regard to their former services, they fell, both of them, victims to the severity of the parliament ". Newcastle, having carried on the attack of Hull for some time, was beat off by a fally of the garrison, and suffered so much, that he thought proper to raise the siege. About the same time, Manchester, who advanced from the eastern associated counties, having joined Cromwel and young Fairfax, obtained a confiderable victory over the royalists at Horncastle; where the two officers last mentioned gained renown by their conduct and gallantry. And though fortune had thus balanced her favours, the king's party still remained much fuperior in those parts of England; and had it not been for the garrison of Hull, which kept Yorkshire in awe, a conjunction of the northern forces with the army in the fouth might have been made, and had probably enabled the king, instead of cntering on the unfortunate, perhaps imprudent, enter-

Rush, vol. vi. p. 275.

m 31st of July.

n 30th of June.

Rush, vol. vi. p. 275.

R 12th of October.

CHAP. prise of Glocester, to march directly to London, and put an end to the war 9.

> WHILE the military enterprises were carried on with vigour in England, and the event became every day more doubtful, both parties cast their eye towards the neighbouring kingdoms, and fought affiftance for the finishing of that enterprise, in which their own forces experienced fuch furious opposition.

> The parliament had recourse to Scotland; the king to Ireland.

WHEN the Scottish covenanters obtained that end, for which they so earnestly contended, the cstablishment of presbyterian discipline in their own country, they were not fatisfied, but indulged still an ardent passion for propagating, by all methods, that mode of religion in the neighbouring kingdoms. Having flattered themselves, in the fervour of their zeal, that, by supernatural assistances, they should be enabled to carry their triumphant covenant to the gates of R'ome itself, it behoved them first to render it prevalent in England, which already showed so great a disposition to receive it. the articles of pacification, they expressed a desire of uniformity in worship with England; and the king, employing general expressions, had approved of this inclination, as pious and laudable. sooner was there an appearance of a rupture, than the English parliament, in order to allure that nation into a close confederacy, openly declared their. wishes of ecclesiastical reformation, and of initating the example of their northern brethren'. When war was actually commenced, the same artifices were used; and the Scots beheld, with the utmost impatience, a scene of action, of which they could not deem themselves indifferent spectators. the king, they faid, be able, by force of arms, to prevail over the parliament of England, and re-establish his authority in that powerful kingdom, he will un- CHAP. doubtedly retract all those concessions, which, with LVI. so many circumstances of violence and indignity, the Scots have extorted from him. Besides a sense of his own interest, and a regard to royal power, which has been entirely annihilated in this country; his very passion for prelacy and for religious ceremonies, must lead him to invade a church which he has ever been taught, to regard as antichristian and unlawful. Let us but consider who the persons are that compose the factions now so furiously engaged Does not the parliament consist of those very men who have ever opposed all war with Scotland, who have punished the authors of our oppressions, who have obtained us the redress of every grievance, and who, with many honourable expresfions, have conferred on us an ample reward for our brotherly assistance? And is not the court sull of papilts, prelates, malignants; all of them zealous enemies to our religious model, and resolute to facrifice their lives, for their idolatrous establishments? Not to mention our own necessary security; can we better express our gratitude to heaven for that pure light with which we are, above all nations, so eminently distinguished, than by conveying the same divine knowledge to our unhappy neighbours, who are wading through a sea of blood in order to attain it? These were, in Scotland, the topics of every conversation: With these doctrines the pulpits echoed: And the famous curse of Meroz, that curse so solemnly denounced and reiterated against neutrality and moderation, resounded from all quarters.

⁹ Warwick, p. 261. Walker, p. 2/3.

Rush. vol. vi. p. 390. Clarendon, vol. in. p. 68.

The parliament of England had ever invited the Scots, from the commencement of the civil dissen-fions,

^{*} Curse ye Meroz, said the angel of the Lord; curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof: Because they came not to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty. Judges, chap. V. VCr. 22.

C HAP. sions, to interpose their mediation, which, they knew, would be so little favourable to the king: And the king, for that very reason, had ever endeavoured, with the least offensive expressions, to decline Early this spring, the earl of Loudon, the chancellor, with other commissioners, and attended by Henderson, a popular and intriguing preacher, was sent to the king at Oxford, and renewed the offer of mediation; but with the same success as before. The commissioners were also empowered to press the king on the article of religion, and to recommend to him the Scottish model of ecclesiastic worship and discipline. This was touching Charles in a very tender point: His honour, his conscience, as well as his interest, he believed to be intimately concerned in supporting prelacy and the liturgy ". He begged the commissioners, therefore, to remain satisfied with the concessions which he had made to Scotland; and, having modelled their own' church according to their own principles, to leave their neighbours is the like Kberty, and not to intermeddle with affairs of which they could not be supposed competent judges w.

THE divines of Oxford, secure, as they imagined, of a victory, by means of their authorities from church history, their quotations from the fathers, and their spiritual arguments, desired a conference with Henderson, and undertook, by dint of reasoning, to convert that great apostle of the north-But Henderson, who had ever regarded as impious, the least doubt with regard to his own principles, and who knew of a much better way to reduce opponents than by employing any theological topics, absolutely refused all disputation or controverfy. The English divines went away full of admiration at the blind assurance and bigoted prejuu See note [HH] at the End of * Rushw. vol. vi. p. 398. W Rushworth, vol. vs. p. 462. the volume.

8

dices of the man: He, on his part, was moved with C HAP. equal wonder at their obstinate attachment to such palpable errors and delusions.

1643.

By the concessions which the king had granted to Scotland, it became necessary for him to summon a parliament once in three years; and in June of the subsequent year, was fixed the period for the meeting of that assembly. Before that time elapsed, Charles flattered himself that he should be able, by fome decifive advantage, to reduce the English parliament to a reasonable submission, and might then expect, with fecurity, the meeting of a Scottish parliament. Though earneady folicited by Loudon to fummon presently that great-council of the nation, he absolutely refused to give authority to men who had already excited fuch dangerous commotions, and who showed fill the same disposition to refift and invade his authority. The commissioners, *there ore, not being able to prevail in any of their demands, defired the king's passport for London, where they purposed to confer with the English parliament *; and being likewife denied this request, they returned with extreme distatisfaction to Edinburgh.

The office of confervators of the peace was newly erected in Scotland, in order to maintain the confederacy between the two kingdoms; and these, instigated by the clergy, were resolved, since they could not obtain the king's consent, to summon, in his name, but by their own authority, a convention of states; and to be eave their sovereign of this article, the only one which remained of his prerogative. Under colour of providing for national peace; endangered by the neighbourhood of English armies, was a convention called y; an assembly which, though it meets with less solemnity, has the same authority as a parliament,

CHAP, in raising money and levying forces. Hamilton, and his brother the earl of Laneric, who had been fent into Scotland in order to oppose these meafures, wanted either authority or fincerity; and paffively yielded to the torrent. The general affembly of the church met at the fame time with the convention, and exercising an authority almost abiolute over the whole civil power, made every political confideration yield to their theological zeal and prejudices.

THE English parliament was, at that time, fallen into great distress, by the progress of the royal arms; and they gladly sent to Edinburgh commisfioners, with ample powers, to treat of a nearer union and confederacy with the Scottish nation. The persons employed were the earl of Rutland, fir William Armyne, fir Henry Vane the younger, Thomas Hatcher, and Henry Darley, attended by Marshal and Nye, two clergymen of signal authority z. In this negotiation, the man chiefly trusted was Vane, who, in eloquence, address, capacity, as well as in art and dissimulation, was not surpassed by any one, even during that age, so famous for active talents. By his persuasion was framed at Edinburgh, that solemn league and covenant, which effaced all former protestations and vows taken in ... both kingdoms; and long maintained its credit and authority. In this covenant, the subscribers, bekdes engaging mutually to defend each other against all. opponents, bound themselves to endeavour, without respect of persons, the extirpation of popery and prelacy, superstition, heresy, schism, and profaneness; to maintain the rights and privileges of parliaments, together with the king's authority; and to discover and bring to justice all incendiaries and malignants .

Solemn league and covenant.

^{*} Whitlocke, p. 73. Rush. vol. vi. p. 466. Clarendon, vol. iii. * Rush, vol. vi. p. 478. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 373. F. 300.

THE subscribers of the covenant vowed also to C-ILAP... preserve the reformed religion established in the LVI. church of Scotland; but, by the artifice of Vane, no declaration more explicit was made with regard to England and Ireland, than that these kingdoms should be reformed, according to the word of God, and the example of the purest churches. The Scottish zealots, wher prelacy was abjured, deemed this expression quite free from ambiguity, and regarded their own model as the only one which corresponded, in any degree, to such a description: But that able politician had other views, and while he employed his great talents in over-reaching the presbyterians, and fecretly laughed at their simplicity, he had blindly devoted himself to the maintenance of fystems still more absurd and more dangerous.

In the English parliament there remained some members, who, though they had been induced, ·either by private ambition, or by zeal for civil liberty, to concur with the majority, still retained an attachment to the hierarchy, and to the ancient modes of worship. But, in the present danger which threatened their cause, all scruples were laid aside; and the covenant, by whose means alone Sept. 17. they could expect to obtain so considerable a rein-· forcement as the accession of the Scottish nation, was received without opposition. The parliament, therefore, having first subscribed it themselves, or-. dered it to be received by all who lived under their authority:

GREAT were the rejoicings among the Scots, that they should be the happy instruments of extending their mode of religion, and dislipating that profound darkness in which the neighbouring nations were involved. The general assembly applauded this glorious imitation of the piety displayed by their ancestors, who, they said, in three different applications, during the reign of Elizabeth, had endeavoured to engage the English, by persuasion, the Scots.

EHAP. to lay aside the use of the surplice, tippet, and corner. cap 5. The convention too, in the height of their zeal, ordered every one to swear to this covenant, under the penalty of confiscation; beside what farther punishment it should please the ensuing parliament to inflict on the refusers, as enemies to God, to the king, and to the kingdom. And being determined that the fword should carry conviction to all refractory minds, they prepared themselves, with great vigilance and activity, for their military en-Arming of terprises. By means of a hundred thousand pounds, which they received from England; by the hopes of good pay and warm quarters; not to mention men's favourable disposition cowards the cause; they foon completed their levies. And, having added, to their other forces, the troops which they had recalled from Ireland, they were ready, about the end of the year, to enter England, under the command of their old general, the earl of Leven, with an army of above twenty thousand men '.

THE king, foreseeing this tempest which was gathering upon him, endeavoured to secure himself by every expedient; and he cast his eye towards Ireland, in hopes that this kingdom, from which his cause had already received so much prejudice, might at length contribute somewhat towards his protection and security.

State of Ireland.

After the commencement of the Irish insurrection, the English parliament, though they undertook the suppression of it, had ever been too much engaged, either in military projects, or expeditions at home, to take any effectual step towards finishing that enterprise. They had entered, indeed, into a contract with the Scots, for sending over an army of ten thousand men into Ireland; and, in order to engage that nation in this undertaking, beside giving a promise of pay, they agreed to put Caricc Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 383.-Rushworth, vol. vi. p. 388.

fergus'

fergus into their hands, and to invest their general CHAP. with an authority quite independent of the English government. These troops, so long as they were allowed to remain, were uleful, by diverting the force of the Irish rebels, and protecting in the north the small remnants of the British planters. But, except this contract with the Scottish nation, all the other measures of the parliament either were hitherto absolutely infignificant, or tended rather to the prejudice of the protestant cause in Ireland. By continuing their violent persecution, and still more violent menaces against priests and papists, they confirmed the Irish catholics in their rebellion, and cut off all hopes of indulgence and toleration. disposing beforehand of all the Irish forfeitures to subscribers or adventurers, they rendered all men of property desperate, and seemed to threaten a total extirpation of the natives d. And while they thus infused zeal and animosity into the enemy, no measure was pursued which could tend to support or encourage the protestants, now reduced to the laste extremities.

So great is the ascendant which, from a long sourse of successes, the English has acquired over the Irish nation, that though the latter, when they , receive military discipline among foreigners, are not furpassed by any troops, they had never, in their own country, been able to make any vigorous effort for the defence or recovery of their liberties. In many rencounters, the English, under lord More, sir William St. Leger, sir Frederic Hamilton, and others, had, though under great disadvantages of situation and numbers, put the Irish to rout, and returned in triumph to Dublin. The rebels raised the siege of Tredah, after an obstinate defence made

⁻⁴ A thousand acres in Ulster were given to every one that subscribed 200 pounds, in Connaught to the subscribers of 350, in Munster for 450, in Leinster for 600. .

CHAP. by the garrison. Ormond had obtained two complete victories at Kilrush and Ross; and had brought relief to all the forts which were belieged or blockaded in different parts of the kingdom f. But notwithstanding these successes, even the most common necessaries of life were wanting to the victorious armies. The Irish, in their wild rage against the British planters, had laid waste the whole kingdom, and were themselves totally unfit, from their habitual sloth and ignorance, to raise any convenience of human life. During the course of fix months no supplies had come from England, except the fourth part of one finall vessel's lading. Dublin, to fave itself from starving, had been obliged to fend the greater part of its inhabitants to England. The army had little ammunition, scarcely exceeding forty barrels of gun-powder; not even shoes or clothes; and for want of food the soldiers had been obliged to eat their own horses. And though, the distress of the Irish was not much inferior s; be-Ides that they were more hardened against such extremities, it was but a melancholy reflection, that the two nations, while they continued their furious animosities, lhould make desolate that fertile island, which might serve to the subsistence and happiness of both.

> THE justices and council of Ireland had been engaged, chiefly by the interest and authority of Ormond, to fall into an entire dependence on the king. Parsons, Temple, Loftus, and Meredith, who favoured the opposite party, had been removed; and Charles had supplied their place by others better affected to his service. A committee of the English house of commons, which had been sent over to Ireland, in order to conduct the affairs of that kingdom, had been excluded the council, in obedience to orders transmitted from the king h.

Rush. vol. vi. p. 306. f Idem, ibid. p. 512. Idem, b Idem, ibid. p. 530. Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 167. ibid. p. 355. And

And these were reasons sussicient, besides the great C II A P. difficulties under which they themselves laboured, LVI. why the parliament was unwilling to fend supplies to an army, which, though engaged in a cause much favoured by them, was commanded by their declared enemies. They even intercepted fonic finall fuccours fent thither by the king.

THE king, as he had neither money, arms, ammunition, nor provisions to spare from his own orgent wants, refolved to embrace an expedient, which might at once relieve the necessities of the Irith proteflams, and contribute to the advancement of his affairs in England. A trace with the rebels, he thought, would enable his fubjects in Ircland to provide for their own support, and would procure him the afiiftance of the army against the English parliament. But as a treaty with a people, to odious for their barbarities, and ttill more for their religion, might be represented in invidious colours, and renew all those calumnies with which he had been loaded; it was necessary to proceed with great caution in . conducting that measure. A remonstrance from the army was made to the Irish council, representing their intolerable necessities, and graving permission *to leave the kingdom: And if that were refused, We must have recourse, they faid, to that first and primary law, with which God has endowed all men; red mean the lare of nature, which teaches very greature to preferve itself. Memorials both to the king and parliament were transmitted by the justices. and council, in which their wants and dangers are firongly fet forth ; and though the general expressions in these memorials might perhaps be sufpected of exaggeration, yet from the particular facts mentioned, from the confession of the English par-Sament itself', and from the very nature of things,

^{*} Idem, ibid. p. 538. ^r Rufhworth, vol. vi. p. 537. ' Idem, ibid. p. 540. NB Vor. VI.

LVI. to great extremities "; and it became prudent in the king, if not absolutely necessary, to embrace some expedient, which might secure them, for a time, from the ruin and misery with which they were threatened.

ACCORDINGLY, the king gave orders " to Ormond and the justices to conclude, for a year, a cessation of arms with the council of Kilkenny, by whom the Irish were governed, and to leave both sides in pesfession of their present advantages. The parliament, whose business it was to find fault with every meafure adopted by the opposite party, and who would not lose so fair an opportunity of reproaching the king with his favour to the Irish papists, exclaimed loudly against this cessation. Among other reasons. they infifted upon the divine vengeance, which England might justly dread, for tolerating antichristian idolatry, on pretence of civil contracts and political agreements. Religion, though every day employed as the engine of their own ambitious purposes, was supposed too sacred to be yielded up to the temporal interests or safety of kingdoms.

AFTIR the cellation, there was little necessity, as well as no means, of subsisting the army in Ireland." The king ordered Ormond, who was entirely devoted to him, to send over considerable bodies of it to England. Most of them continued in his service; but a small part, having imbibed in Ireland, a strong animosity against the catholics, and hearing the king's party universally reproached with popery, soon after deserted to the parliament.

m See tarther, Carte's Ormond, vol. iii. No. 113. 127, 128, 129. 134. 136. 141. 144. 149. 158, 159. All these papers put it past doubt, that the necessities of the English army in Iteland were extreme. See faither, Rush. vol. vi. p. 537. and Dupdale, p. $53, 854

^{7 7}th September. See Rush. vol. vi. p. 537. 544. 547.

Some Irish catholics came over with these troops, C HAP. and joined the royal army, where they continued the same cruelties and disorders to which they had been accustomed. The parliament voted, that no quarter, in any action, should ever be given them: But prince Rupert, by making some reprisals, soon repressed this inhumanity.

P Whitlocke, p. 78. 103. . 4 Rush. vol. vi. p. 680. 783.

NOTES

TO THE

IXTH VOLUME.

NOTE [A], p. 19.

CIR Charles Cornwallis, the king's ambassador at Madrid, when pressed by the Duke of Berma to enter into a league with Spain, faid to that minister; though his majeffy was an absolute king, and therefore not bound to give an account to any, of his actions; yet that fo gracious and regardful a prince he was of the love and contentment of his own subjects, as I assured myself be would not think it fit to do any thing of fo great confequence without acquainting them with his intentione. Winwood, vol. ii. p. 222. Sir Walter Raleigh has this passage in the preface to his History of the World: Philip II. by strong hand and main force, attempted to make bimself not only an absolute monarch over the Netherlands, like unto the kings and monarchs of England and France, but Turk-like, to tread under his feet all their natural and fundamental laws, privileges, and ancient rights. We meet with this passage in sir John Davis's Question concerning Impositions, p. 161. "Thus we see by this comparison, that the king of England doth lay but his " little finger upon his fubjects, when other princes and " states do lay their heavy loins upon their people: What is the reason of this difference? From whence cometh ee it? Nn3

" it? A sturedly not from a different power of prerogative: For the king of England is as absolute a monarch as so any emperor or king in the world, and hath as many or prerogatives incident to his crown." Coke, in Cawdry s case, says, "That, by the ancient laws of this realm, England is an absolute empire and monarchy; and that the king is furnished with plenary and entire power, prerogative, and jurisdiction, and is supreme governor over all persons within this realm." Spencer, speaking of some grants of the English kings to the Irish corporations, says, "All which, though at the time of their sirst er grant they were tolerable, and perhaps reasonable, yet so now are most unreasonable and inconvenient. these will easily be cut off, with the superior power of her majesty's prerogative, against which her own grants are not to be pleaded or enforced." State of Ireland, p. 1537. edit. 1706. The same author, in p. 1660, proposes a plan for the civilization of Ireland; that the queen " should create a provost marshal in every county, who might ride about with eight or ten followers in fearch of Aragglers and vagabonds; the first time he catches any he may punish them more lightly by the stocks; the second time, by whipping; but the third time he may hang them, without trial or process, on the first bough: And he thinks that this authority may more fafely be entrufted to the provost marshal than to the sheriff; because the latter magistrate, having a profit by the escheats of selons, may be tempted to hang innocent persons. Here a real, absolute, or rather despotic power is pointed out; and we may infer from all these passages, either that the word absolute bore a different sense from what it does at present, or that men's ideas of the English, as well as Irish government, were then different. This latter inference feems juster. The word being derived from the French, bore always the same sense as in that language. An absolute monarchy, in Charles I.'s answer to the nineteen propositions, is opposed to a limited; and the king of " England is acknowledged not to be absolute: So much had matters changed even before the civil war. In fir John Fortescue's treatise of absolute and limited monarchy, a book written in the reign of Edward the IVth, the word absolute is taken in the same sense as at present; and the government of England is also said not to be absolute.

They were the princes of the house of Tudor chiesly who introduced that administration, which had the appearance of absolute government. The princes before them were restrained by the barons; as those after them by the house of commons. The people had, properly speaking, little liberty in either of these ancient governments, but least in the more ancient.

NOT-E [B], p. 20.

EVEN this parliament, which shewed so much spirit and good sense in the affair of Goodwin, made a strange concession to the crown, in their south session. Toby Mathews, a member, had been banished by order of the council upon direction from his majesty. The parliament not only acquiesced in this arbitrary proceeding, but issued writs for a new election. Such novices were they as yet in the principles of liberty! See Journ. 14 Feb. 1609. Mathews was banished by the king, on account of his change of religion to popery. The king had an induspence to those who had been educated catholics; but could not bear the new converts. It was probably the animosity of the commons against the papists, which made them acquiesce in this precedent, without resecting on the consequences! The jealousy of liberty, though roused, was not yet thoroughly enlightened.

NOTE [C], p. 23.

A T that time men of genius and enlarged minds had adopted the principles of liberty, which were as yet pretty much unknown to the generality of the people. Sir Matthew Hales has published a remonstrance against the king's conduct towards the parliament during this session. The remonstrance is drawn with great force of reasoning, and spirit of liberty; and was the production of fir Francis Bacon and fir Edwin Sandys, two men of the greatest parts and knowledge in England. It is drawn in the name of the commons; but as there is no hint of it in the journals, we must conclude, either that the authors, sensible that the strain of the piece was much beyond the N n 4 principles of the age, had not ventured to prefent it to the house, or that it had been for that reason rejected. The dignity and authority of the commons are strongly insisted upon in this remonstrance; and it is there said, that their submitton to the ill treatment which they received during the latter part of Elizabeth's reign, had proceeded from their tenderness towards her age and her tex. But the authors are mistaken in these saids: For the house received and submitted to as bad treatment in the beginning and middle of that reign." The government was equally arbitrary in Mary's reign, in Edward's, in Harry the eighth and seventh's. And the farther we go back into history, though there might be more of a certain irregular kind of liberty among the barons, the commons were still of less authority.

NOTE [D], p. 27

👣 IIIS parliament passed an act of recognition of the king's title in the most ample term . They recognifed and acknowledged, that immediately upon the dif-Volution and decease of Elizibeth, late queen of England, the imperial crown the roof did, by inherent birdwight and lawful and undoubted directifion, defected and come to his moil excellent majetty, as being lineally, justly, and lawfully next and fole heir of the blood toyal of this realm. I Jomes I. cap. i. The puritant, though then prevalent, did not think proper to dispute this great constitutional point. In the recognition of queen Elizabeth, the parliament declares, that the queen's highnels is, and if very deed and of most mere right ought to be, by the laws of God and by the lows and statutes of this realm, our most lawful and rightful tovereign, liege hidy and queen, &c. It appears il en, that if king James's divine right be not meurioued by parliament, the omission came merely from chance, and because that phrase did not occur to the compaler of the accognition; his title being plainly the fame with that of his predecessor, who was allowed to have a divine right.

NOTE [E], p. 36.

Monteagle was written by his direction, in order to obtain the praise of penetration in discovering the plot. But the known fire, resute this supposition. That letter, being commonly talked of, might naturally have given an alarm to the compirators, and made them contrive their escape. The writ of the lard chamberlain ought to have had the same essect in short, it appears that nobody was arrested or inquired after for some days, till Fawkes discovered the names of the conspirators. We may infer, however, from a letter in Winwood's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 171 that Salithary's sagacity ted the king in his conjectures, and that the minister, like an artful courtier, give his matter the praise of the whole discovery.

NOTE [F], p. 52.°

VALE find the king's answer in Winwood's Memorial, vol. iii. p. 193. ed edit. To the third and so fourth (namely, that it might be lawful to arrest the " king's fervants without leave, and that no man should " be enforced to lend money, nor to give a reason why Le " would not) his majefty fent us an answer, that because " we brought precedents of antiquity to strengthen those " demand; he allowed not of any precedents drawn from "The time of uturping or decaying princes, or people too " bold or wanton; that he defired not to gevern in that commonwealth, where inbjects should be affired of all things, and hope for nothing. It was one thing fub-" mittere privilepatum legibus; and another thing submitters " principation fielditis. That he would not leave to pos-"therefore his conclusion was, non placet politica, it is " placet exemplars: Yet with this mitigation, that in me ters of loans he would refuse no reasonable excuse, nor " should my lord chamberlain deny the arresting of any ef of his majefty's fervants, if just cause was shewn" The parliament, however, acknowledged at this time with thankfulre@ thankfulness to the king, that he allowed disputes and inquiries about his prerogative, much beyond what had been indulged by any of his predecessors. Parliament. Hist. vol. v. p. 230. This very sessions, he expressly gave them leave to produce all their grievances without exception.

NOTE [G], p. 56.

IT may not be unworthy of observation, that James, in a book called The true Larus of free Monarchies, which he published a little before his accellion to the crown of England, assirmed, "That a good king, although he be " above the law, will subject and frame his actions " thereto, for example's fake to his subjects, and of his " own free-will, but not as subject or bound thereto." In another passage, "According to the fundamental law al-" ready alleged, we daily fee, that in the patllament " (which is nothing else but the head-court of the king " and his vassals) the laws are but craved by his subjects, and only made by him at their rogation, and with their 46 advice. For albeit the king make daily statutes and or-"dinances, enjoining fuch pains thereto as he think. " meet, without any advice of palliament or estates; yet it lies in the power of, no parliament to make any kind of law or statute, without his sceptre be to it, for giving " it the force of a law!" King James's Works, p. 202. It is not to be supposed that, at such a critical juncture, James had so little sense as, directly, in so material a point, to have openly shocked what were the universal established principles of that age: On the confrary, we are told by historians, that nothing tended more to facilitate his accession, than the good opinion entertained of him by the' English, on account of his learned and judicious writings. The question, however, with regard to the royal power was, at this time, become a very dangerous point; and without employing ambiguous, infignificant terms, which determined nothing, it was impossible to please both king and parliament. Dr. Cowell, who had magnified the prerogative in words too intelligible, sell this sellion under the indignation of the commons. Parliament. Hift. vol. v. p. 221. The king himself, after all his magnificent boafts, was obliged to make his escape through a distinction, king in concreto: An abstract king, he said, and all power; but a concrete king was bound to observe the saws of the country which he governed. King James's Wooks, p. 533. But how bound? By conscience only? Or might his subjects resist him and detend their privileges? This he thought not sit to explain. And so difficult is it to explain that point, that, to this day, whatever liberties may be used by private inquirers, the saws have, very prudently, thought proper to maintain a total silence with regard to it.

NOTE [H], p. 73.

part. HIST. vol. v. p. 290. So little fixed at this time were the rules of parliament, that the commons complained to the peers of a speech made in the upper house by the bishop of Lincoln; which it belonged only to that house to censure, and which the other could not regularly be supposed to be acquainted with. These at least are the tules established since the parliament became a real seat of power, and seene of business. Neither the king must take notice of what passes in either house, nor either house of what passes in the other, till regularly informed of it. The commons, in their samous protestation 1621, sixed this rule with regard to the king, though at present they would not bind themselves by it. But as liberty was yet new, those maxims which guard and regulate it were unknown and unpractised.

NOTE [1], p. 98.

Some of the facts in this narrative, which seem to condemn Raleigh, are taken from the king's declaration, which being published by authority, when the facts were recent, being extracted from examinations before the privy council, and subscribed by six privy counsellors, among whom was Abbot archbishop of Canterbury, a prelate nowise complaisant to the court, must be allowed to have great weight, or rather to be of undoubted credit. Yet the most material sacts are confirmed either by the nature and reason of the thing, or by sir Walter's own apology and his letters. The king's declaration is in the Har-leyan Miscellary, vol. iii. No. 2.

1. There feems to be an improbability that the Spaniards, who knew nothing of Raleigh's pretended mine, should have built a town in so wide a coast, within three miles of it. The chances are extremely against fuch a supposition: And it is more natural to think, that the view of plundering the town led Lim thither, than that of working a mine. 2. No fuch mine is there found to this day. 3. Raleigh in fact found no mine, and in fact he plundered and burnt a Spanish town. Is it not more probable, therefore, that the latter was his intention? How can the fecrets of his breast be rendered so visible as to counterpoise certain sacts? 4. He confesses, in his letter to lord Carew, that though he knew it, yet he concealed from the king the fettlement of the Spaniards on that" coath. Does not this fact alone render him sufficiently criminal? 5. His commission empowers him only to settle on a couft possessed by tayage and barbarous inhabitants. Was it not the most evident breach of orders to disembark on a coast possession by Spaniards? 6. His orders to Keymis, when he fent him up the river, are contained in his own a apology, and from them it appears, that he know (what was unavoidable that the Spaniards would refitt, and would oppose the English Linding and taking possession of the country. His infentions, therefore, were hostile from the beginning. 7. Without provocation, and even when at a diffance, he gave Krymis orders to diffodge the Spaniards from their own town. Could any enterprise be more holide? And confidering the Spaniards as allies to the nation, could any enterprise be more criminal? Was he not the aggressor, even though it should be true that the Spaniards med upon his men at fanding? It is faid, he killed three or four hundred of them. Is that fo light a matter? 8. In his letter to the king, and in his apology, he grounds his defence on former hollilities exercifed by the Spaniards against other companies of Englishmen. These are accounted for by the ambiguity of the treaty between the nations. And it is plain, that though these might possibly tion, they could never entitle Raleigh to declare war, and without any commission, or contrary to his commission, to invade the Spanish settlements. He prefends indeed that peace was never made with Spain in the Indies: A most absurd notion! The chief hurt which the Spaniards could receive from England was in the Indies; and they never would have made peace at all, if hostilities had been still to be continued on these settlements. By secret agreement, the English were still allowed to support the Dutch even after the treaty of peace. If they had also been allowed to invade the Spanish settlements, the treaty had been a full peace to England, while the Spaniards were still exposed to the full essects of war. o. If the claim to the property of that country, as first discoverers, was good, in oppofition to prefent fettlement, as Raleigh pretends; why was it not laid before the king with all its circumstances, and fubmitted to his judgment? 10. Raleigh's force is acknowledged by himself to have been insufficient to support him in the possession of St. Thomas, against the power of which Spain was master on that coast; yet it was sufficient, as he owns, to take by furprife and plunder twenty towns. It was not therefore his defign to fettle, but to plunder. By these confessions, which I have here brought together, he plainly betrays himfelf. 14. Why did he not stay and work his mine, as at first he projected? He apprelicaded that the Spaniards would be upon him with a greater force. But before he left England, he knew that This must be the case, if he invaded any part of the Spanish colonies. His intention therefore never was to fettle, but only to plunder. 12. He acknowledges that he knew neither the depth nor riches of the mine, but only that there was fonie ore there. Would be have ventured all his fortune and credit on so precarious a sequadation? 13. Would the other adventurers, if made acquainted with this, have risked every thing to attend him? Cught a fleet to have been equipped for an experiment? Was there not plainly an impolture in the management of this affair? 14. He fays to Keymis, in his orders, Bring but a balketfull of ore, and it will fatisfy the king that my project was not imaginary. This was cafily done from the Sparith mines; and he feems to have been chiefly displeased at Keymis for not attempting it. Such a view was a premeditated apology to cover his cheat. 15. The king in his declaration imputes it to Raleigh, that as from as he was at sea, he immediately sell into such uncertain and doubtful talk of his mine, and faid, that it would be sufficien: O ficient if he brought home a basket-full of ore. From the circumstance last mentioned, it appears that this imputation was not without reason. 16. There are many other circumstances of great weight in the king's declaration, that Raleigh, when he fell down to Plymouth, took no pioneers with him, which he always declared to be his intention; that he was nowife provided with instruments for working a mine, but had a sufficient slock of warlike stores; that young Raleigh, in attacking the Spaniards, employed the words which, in the narration, I have put in his mouth; that the mine was moveable, and shifted as he saw convenient: Not to mention many other public facts which prove him to have been highly criminal against his companions as well as his country. Howel, in his letters, fays, that there lived in London, in 1645, an officer, a man of honour, who afferted, that he heard young. Raleigh speak these words, vol. ii. letter 63. That was a time when there was no interest in maintaining fuch a fact. 17. Raleigh's account of his first voyage to Guiana proves him to have been a man capable of the most extravagant credulity or most impudent imposture. So ridiculous are the stories which he tells of the Inca's chimerical empire in the midst of Guiana; the rich city of El Do-. rado, or Manao, wo days' journey is length, and thining with gold and filver; the old Peruvian prophecies in favour of the English, who, he says, were expressly named as the deliverers of that country, long before any European had ever touched there; the Amazons, or republic of women; and in general, the vast and incredible riches which he saw on that continent, where nobody has yet found any treafures! This whole narrative is a proof that he was extremely defective either in folid understanding, or morals, or both. No man's character indeed seems ever to have been carried to such extremes as Raleigh's, by the opposite passions of envy and pity. In the former part of his life, when he was active and lived in the world, and was probably best known, he was the object of universal hatred and detestation throughout England; and the latter part, when that up in prison, he became, much more unreasonably, the object of great love and admiration.

As to the circumstances of the narrative, that Raleigh's pardon was resused him, that his former sentence was purposely kept in force against him, and that he went out under under these express conditions, they may be supported by the following authorities. 1. The king's word and that of fix privy counsellors, who assirm it for fact. 2. The nature of the thing. If no suspicion had been entertained of his intentions, a pardon would never have been refused to a man to whom authority was entrusted. 3. The words of the commission itself, where he is simply styled sir Walter Raleigh, and not fuithful and well-beloved, according to the usual and never-failing style on such occasions. 4. In all the letters which he wrote home to fir Ralph Winwood and to his own wife, he always confiders himfelf as a person unpardoned and liable to the law. He feems indeed, immediately upon the failure of his enterprise, to have become desperate, and to have expected the fate which he met with.

It is pretended, that the king gave intelligence to the Spaniards of Raleigh's project; as if he han needed to lay a plotefer destroying a man, whose life had been fourteen years, and still was, in his power. The Spaniards wanted no other intelligence to be on their guard, than the known and public fact of Raleigh's armament. And there was no reason why the king should conceal from them the project of a settlement, which Raleigh pretended, and the king believed, to be entirely innocent.

The king's chief blame feems to have lain in his negligence, in allowing Raleigh to depart without a more exact ferutiny: But for this he apologifes by faying, that jureties were required for the good behaviour of Raleigh and all his affociates in the enterprise, but that they gave in bonds for each other: A cheat which was not perceived till they had failed, and which increased the suspicion of bad intentions.

Perhaps the king ought also to have granted Raleigh a pardon for his old ticason, and to have tried him anew-for his new offences. His punishment in that case would not only have been just, but conducted in a just and unexceptionable manner. But we are told that a ridiculous opimions at that time prevailed in the nation, (and it is plainly supposed by fir Walter in his apology,) that, by treaty, war was allowed with the Spaniards in the Indies, though peace was made in Europe: And while that notion took place, no jury would have found Raleigh guilty. So that had not the king punished him upon the old sentence, the Spaniards Spaniards would have had a just cause of complaint against the king sufficient to have produced a war, at least to have destroyed all cordiality between the nations.

This explication I thought necessary, in order to clear up the story of Raleigh; which, though very obvious, is generally unstaken in so gross a manner, that I scarcely know its parallel in the English history.

NOTE [K], p. 106.

THIS parliament is remarkable for being the epoch, in which were tril regularly fermed, though without acquiring their denominations, the parties of court and country; parties which have ever fince continued, and which, while they of threaten the total infibilition of the government, are the real causes of its permanent life and In the ancient fendal conflitution, of which the Englith partook with other European nations, there was a mexture, not of authority and liberty, which we have fince enjoyed in this iffand, and which now fubrift uniformly together; but of authority and anarchy, which perpetually Theck I with each other, and which took place alternately, according as circumflances were more or I for favourable to either of them. A parliament composed of barbarians, fummoned from their kelds and forests, uninstructed by study, convertation, or travel; ignorant of their own liws and hittory, and unacquainted with the fituation of all foreign nations; a parliament called precarioully by the king, and diffolved at his pleafure; fitting a few day;, debating a few points prepared for them, and whose members were impatient to return to their own callles, where alone they were great, and to the chafe, which was their. favourite amusement: Such a parliament was very little fitted to enter into a difcustion of all the quellions of government, and to there, in a regular manner, the legal administration. The name, the authority of the king alone appeared in the common course of government; in extraordinary emergencies, he affumed, with Hill better reafon, the fole direction; the imperied and unformed laws left, in every thing, a latitude of interpretation; and when the ends purfued by the monarch were, in general, agreeable to his subjects, little scruple or jealousy was entertained tained with regard to the regularity of the means. During the reign of an able, fortunate, or popular prince, no member of either house, much less of the lower, durst think of entering into a formed party, in opposition to the court; fince the diffolution of the parliament must, in a few days, lcave him unprotected, to the vengeance of his sovereign, and to those stretches of prerogative, which were then so easily made, in order to punish an obnoxious subject. During an unpopular and weak reign, the current commonly ran so strong against the monarch, that none durst inlift themselves in the court party; or if the prince was able to engage any considerable barons on his side, the question was decided with arms in the field, not by debates or arguments in a senate or assembly. And upon the whole, the chief circumstance, which, during ancient times, retained the prince in any, legal form of administra-tion, was, that the sword, by the nature of the feudal tenures, remained still in the hands of his subjects; and this irregular and dangerous check had much more influence than the regular and methodical limits of the laws and constitution. As the nation could not be compelled, it was necessary that every public measure of consequence, particularly that of levying new taxes, should seem to be adopted by common confent and approbation.

The princes of the house of Tudor, partly by the vigour of their administration, partly by the concurrence of favourable circumstances, had been able to establish a more regular system of government; but they drew the constitution so near to despotism as diminished extremely the authority of the parliament. The senate became, in a great degree, the organ of royal will and pleasure: Opposition would have been regarded as a species of rebellion: And even religion, the most dangerous article in which innovations could be introduced, had admitted, in the course of a few years, four several alterations, from the authority alone of the fovergign. The parliament was not then the road to honour and preferment: The talents of popular intrigue and eloquence were uncultivated and unknown: And though that assembly still preserved authority, and retained the privilege of making laws and bestowing public money, the members acquired not, upon that account, either with prince or people, much more What powers were necessary weight and confideration. for Oo . Vol. VI.

for conducting the machine of government, the king was accustomed, of himself, to assume. His own revenues supplied him with money sufficient for his ordinary expences. And when extraordinary emergencies occurred, the prince needed not to solicit votes in parliament, either for making laws or imposing taxes, both of which were now become requisite for public interest and preservation.

The security of individuals, so necessary to the liberty of popular conneils, was totally unknown in that age. And as no despotic princes, scarcely even the eastern tyrants, rule entirely without the concurrence of some assemblies, which supply both advice and authority; little but a mercenary force seems then to have been wanting towards the establishment of a simple monarchy in England. The militia, though more savourable to regal authority than the seudal institutions, was much inserior, in this respect, to disciplined armies; and if it did not preserve liberty to the people, it preserved at least the power, if ever the inclination should arise of recovering it.

But so low, at that time, run the inclination towards liberty, that Elizabeth, the last of that arbitrary line, herfelf no less arbitrary, was yet the most renowned and most' popular of all the fovereigns that had filled the throne of England. It was natural for James to take the government as he found it, and to purfue her measures, which he heard so much applaaded; nor did his penetration extend fo far as to discover, that neither his circumstances nor his character could support so extensive an authority. His narrow revenues and little frugality began now to render him dependent on his people, even in the ordinary course. of administration: Their increasing knowledge discovered to them that advantage which they had obtained; 'and made them fensible of the inestimable value of civil liberty. And as he possessed too little dignity to command respect, and too much good-nature to impress fear, a new spirit discovered itself every day in the parliament; and a party, watchful of a free constitution, was regularly formed in the house of commons.

But notwithstanding these advantages acquired to liberty, so extensive was royal authority, and so firmly established in all its parts, that it is probable the patriots of that age would have despaired of ever resisting it, had they not been stimulated by religious motives, which which inspire a courage unsurmountable by any human obstacle.

The same alliance which has ever prevailed between kingly power and ecclessifical authority, was now fully established in England; and while the prince assisted the clergy in suppressing schissmatics and innovators, the clergy, in return, inculcated the dectrine of an unreserved submission and obedience to the civil magistrate. The genius of the church of England, so kindly to monarchy, forwarded the confederacy; its submission to episcopal jurisdiction; its attachment to ceremonies, to order, and to a decent pomp and splendor of worship; and, in a word, its affinity to the tame superstition of the catholics, rather than to the wild far:aticism of the puritans.

On the other hand, opposition to the church, and the persecutions under which they laboured, were sufficient to throw the puritans into the country party, and to beget po-Mitical principles little favourable to the high pretentions of the fovereign. The spirit, too of enthusiasm; bold, daring, and uncontrolled; strongly disposed their minds to adopt republican tenets; and inclined them to arrogate, in their actions and conduct, the same liberty which they assumed in their rapturous flights and ecstasies. Ever since the first origin of that sect, through the whole reign of Elizabeth as well as of James, puritanical principles had been understood in a double sense, and expressed the opinions favourable both to political and to ecclesiastical liberty. "And as the court, in order to discredit all parliamentary opposition, assixed the denomination of puritans to its antagonists; the religious puritans willingly adopted this idea, which was so advantageous to them, and which consounded their cause with that of the patriots or country party. Thus were the civil and ecclesiastical factions regularly formed; and the humour of the nation during that age. running strongly towards fanatical extravagancies, the spirit of civil liberty gradually revived from its lethargy, and by means of its religious affociate, from which it reaped more advantage than honour, it fecretly enlarged its dominion over the greater part of the kingdom.

This Note was in the first editions a part of the text; but the author omitted it, in order to avoid, as much as possible, the style of dissertation in the body of his history. The passage, however, hornever, contains views so important, that he thought it might be admitted as a note.

NOTE [L], p. 116.

THIS protestation is so remarkable, that it may not be improper to give it in its own words. "The commons now affembled in parliament, being justly occa-" sioned thereunto, concerning sundry liberties, franchises, and privileges of parliament, amongst others here mentioned, do make this protestation following: That the liberties, franchises, and jurisdictions of parliament are the ancient and undoubted birth-right and inheritance of the subjects of England; and that the urgent and arduous affairs concerning the king, state, and defence of the realm, and of the church of England; and the maintenance and making of laws, and redrefs of mifchiefs and grievances, which daily happen within this " realm, are proper subjects and matter of council and debate in parliament; and that in the handling and proceeding of those businesses, every member of the house of parliament hath, and of right ought to have, freedom of speech to propound, treat, reason, and bring to conclusion the same; and that the commons in parliament have like liberty and freedom to treat of these matters, in such order as in their judgment shall seem? fittest; and that every member of the said house hath "like freedom from all impeachment, imprisonment, and molestation (other than by censure of the house itself) " for or concerning any speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the parliament of parliament business. And that if any of the said members. be complained of and quellioned for any thing done or s said in parliament, the same is to be shewn to the king by the advice and affent of all the commons affembled'. in parliament, before the king give credence to any private information." Franklyn, p. 65. Rushworth, vol. i. p. 53. Kennet, p. 747. Coke, p. 77.

NOTE [M], p. 141:

THE moment the prince embarked at St. Andero's, he faid, to those about him, that it was folly in the Spaniards to use him so ill, and allow him to depart: A proof that the duke had made him believe they were infincere in the affair of the marriage and the Palatinate; for as to his reception, in other respects, it had been altogether unexceptionable. Besides, had not the prince believed the Spaniards to be infincere, he had no reason to quarrel with them, though Buckingham had. It appears, therefore, that Charles himself must have been deceived. The multiplied delays of the dispensation, though they arose from accident, afforded Buckingham a plausible pretext for charging the Spaniards with infincerity.

NOTE [N], p. 143.

AMONG other particulars, he mentions a sum of 80,000 pounds borrowed from the king of Denmark. In a former speech to the parliament, he told them, that he had expended 500,000 pounds in the cause of the Palatine, besides the voluntary contribution given him by the people. See Franklyn, p. 50. But what is more extraordinary, the treasurer, in order to shew his own good services, boasts to the parliament, that, by his contrivance, 60,000 pounds had been saved in the article of exchange in the sums remitted to the Palatine. This seems a great sum, nor is it easy to conceive whence the king could procure such vast sums as would require a sum so considerable to be paid in exchange. From the whole, however, it appears, that the king had been far from neglecting the interests of his daughter and son-in-law, and had even gone far beyond what his narrow revenue could afford.

NOTE [O], p. 144.

HOW little this principle had prevailed, during any former period of the English government, particularly during the last reign, which was certainly not so perfect a model of liberty as most writers would represent it, will easily appear from many passages in the history of that reign. But the ideas of men were much changed, during about twenty years of a gentle and peaceful administration. The commons, though James of himself had recalled all patents of monopolies, were not contented without a law against them, and a declaratory law too; which was gaining a great point, and establishing principles very favourable to Eberty: But they were extremely grateful, when Elizabeth, upon petition (aster having once resused their requests), recalled a sew of the most operative patents; and employed some soothing expressions towards them.

The parliament had furely reason, when they confessed, in the seventh of James, that he allowed them more freedom of debate than ever was indulged by any of his predecessors. His indulgence in this particular, joined to his easy temper, was probably one cause of the great power assumed by the commons. Monsieur de la Boderie, in his dispatches, vol. i. p. 449. mentions the liberty of speech in the house of commons as a new practice.

NOTE [P], p. 150.

RYMER, tom. xviii. p. 224. It is certain that the young prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II. had protestant governors from his early infancy; sirst the earl of Newcastle, then the marquis of itertford. The king, in his memorial to foreign churches, after the commencement of the civil wars, insists on his care in educating his children in the protestant religion, as a proof that he was nowise inclined to the catholic. Ruthworth, vol. v. p. 752. It can scarcely, therefore, be questioned, but this article, which had so odd an appearance, was inserted only to amuse the pope, and was never intended by either party to be executed.

NOTE [Q], p. 161.

" MONARCHIES," according to fir Walter Raleigh, are of two forts touching their power or autho-" rity, viz. 1. Entire, where the whole power of ordering all state matters, both in peace and war, doth by " law and custom appertain to the prince; as in the " English kingdom; where the prince hath the power to " make laws, league and war; to create magistrates; to or pardon life; of appeal, &c. Though to give a contentment to the other degrees? they have a suffrage in-" making laws, yet ever subject to the prince's pleasure 44 and negative will.—2. Limited or restrained, that hath on no full power in all the points and matters of state, as the military king that hath not the fovereignty in time of peace, as the making of laws, &c. But in war only, as the Polonian king." Maxims of State. . And a little after, "In every just state, some part of the government is, or ought to be, imparted to the people, as in a kingdom, a voice and fuffrage in making laws; " and fometimes also of levying of arms (if the charge be " great, and the prince forced to borrow help of his fub-" jects), the matter rightly may be propounded to a par-" liament, that the tax may feem to have proceeded from thems lves. So consultations and some proceedings in 's judicial matters may, in part, be referred to them. The " reason, lest, seeing themselves to be in no number nor of reckoning, they millike the state or government." This way of reasoning differs little from that of king James, who considered the privileges of the parliament as matters of grace and indulgence more than of inheritance. It is remarkable that Raleigh was thought to lean towards the puritanical party, notwithstanding these posi-But ideas of government change much in disferent tions. times.

Raleigh's sentiments on this head are still more openly expressed, in his Prerogative of Parliaments, a work not published till after his death. It is a dialogue between a courtier courtier or counsellor and a country instice of peace, who represents the patriot party, and defends the highest notions of liberty, which the principles of that age would bear. Here is a passage of it: "Counseller. That which is cone by the king, with the advice of his private or privy council, is done by the king's absolute power. Justice. And by whose power is it done in parliament, but by the king's absolute power? Mistake it not, my lord: The three estates do but advise as the privy council doth; which advice, if the king embrace, it becomes the king's own act in the one, and the king's law in the other, &c."

The earl of Clare, in a private letter to his fon-in-law fir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards earl of Strafford, thus expresses himself: "We live under a prerogative govern-" ment, where book law submits to lex loquens." He spoke from his own and all his ancestors' experience. There was no single instance of power which a king of England might not, at that time, exert on pretence of neceffity or expediency: The continuance alone or frequent repetition of arbitrary administration might prove daugerous, for want of force to support it. It is remarkable that this letter of the earl of Clare was written in the first year of Charles's reign'; and consequently must be meant of the general genius of the government, not the spirit or temper of the monargh. See Strafford's Letters, vol. i. p. 32. From another letter in the same collection, vol. i. p. 10. it appears, that the council sometimes rassumed the power of forbidding persons disagreeable to the court, to stand in the elections. This authority they could exert in some' instances; but we are not thence to infer, that they could that the door of that house to every one who was not acceptable to them. The genius of the ancient government reposed more trust in the king, than to entertain any such suspicion, and it allowed scattered instances, of such a kind as would have been totally destructive of the constitution, had they been continued without interruption.

I have not met with any English writer in that age who speaks of England as a limited monarchy, but as an absolute one, where the people have many privileges. That is no contradiction. In all European monarchies the people have privileges; but whether dependent or independent on the will of the monarch, is a question, that, in most governments, L'

governments, it is better to forbear. Surely that question was not determined before the age of James. The rising spirit of the parliament, together with that king's love of general, speculative principles, brought it from its obscurity, and made it be commonly canvassed. The strongest testimony that I remember from a writer of James's age, in favour of English liberty, is in cardinal Bentivoglio, a foreigner, who mentions the English government as similar to that of the Low-country provinces under their princes, rather than to that of France or Spain. Englishmen were not so sensible that their prince was limited, because they were sensible that no 'individual had any security against a stretch of prerogative: But foreigners, by comparison, could perceive that these stretches were at that time, from custom or other causes, less frequent in England than in other monarchies. Philip de Comines too remarked the English constitution to be more popular in his time than that of France. But in a paper written by a patriot in 1627, it is remarked, that the freedom of speech in parliament had been lost in England since the days of Co-See Franklyn, p. 238. Here is a stanza of Malherbe's Ode to Mary de Medicis, the queen-regent, written in 1614.

Entre les rois à qui cet age
Doit son principal ornement,
Ceux de la Tamise et du Tage
Font louer leur gouvernement:
Mais en de si calmes provinces,
Ou le peuple adore les princes,
Et met au gré le plus haut
L'honneur du sceptre legitime, Scauroit-on excuser le crime
De ne regner pas comme il faut.

The English, as well as the Spaniards, are here pointed out as much more obedient subjects than the French, and much more tractable and submissive to their princes. Though this passage be taken from a poet, every man of judgment will allow its authority to be decisive. The character of a national government cannot be unknown in Europe; though it changes sometimes very suddenly. Machiavel, in his Dissertations on Livy, says repeatedly, that that France was the most legal and most popular monarchy then in Europe.

NOTE [R], p. 161.

PASSIVE obedience is expressly and zealously incutcated in the homities, compoted and published by authority, in the reign of queen Elizabeth. The convocation, which met in the very first year of the king's reign, voted as high monarchical principles as are contained in the decrees of the university of Oxford, during the rule of the These principles, so far from being deemed a novelty, introduced by James's influence, passed so smoothly, that no historian has taken notice of them: They were mever the subject of controversy, or dispute, or discourse; and it is only by means of bishop Overall's Convocationbook, printed near feventy years after, that we are acquainted with them. Would James, who was fo cautious, and even timid, have ventured to begin his reign with a. bold stroke, which would have given just ground of jealoufy to his subjects? It appears from that monarch's Bafilicon Doron, written while he was in Scotland, that the republican ideas of the origin of power from the peoble were, at that time, esteemed puritanical novelties. patriarchal scheme, it is remarkable, is inculcated in those votes of the convocation preserved by. Overall; nor was Filmer the first inventor of those absurd notions.

NOTE [S], p. 181.

THAT of the honest historian Stowe seems not to have been of this number. "The great blessings of God," says he, "through increase of wealth in the common subights of this land, especially upon the citizens of London; such within men's memory, and chiesly within these sew years of peace, that, except there were now due mention of some sort made thereof, it would in time to come be held incredible, &c." In another place, Amongst the manifold tokens and signs of the infinite blessings

blessings of Almighty God bestowed upon this kingdom, by the wondrous and merciful citablishing of peace within ourselves, and the full benefit of concord with "all Christian nations and others: Of all which graces et let no man dare to presume he can speak too much; whereof in truth there can never be enough faid, neither was their ever any people less considerate and less thankful than at this time, being not willing to endure " the memory of their present happiness, as well as in the " universal increase of commerce and traffic throughout the kingdom, great building of royal ships and by pri-" vate merchants, the re-peopling of cities, towns, and villages, beside the discernible and sudden increase of " fair and costly buildings, as well within the city of London as the suburbs thereof, especially within these twelve " years, &c."

NOTE [T], p. 217.

BY a speech of sir Simon D'Ewes, in the sirst year of the long parliament, it clearly appears, that the nation never had, even to that time, been rightly informed conceining the transactions of the Spanish negotiation, and still believed the court of Madrid to have been altogether infincere in their professions. What reason, upon that supposition, had they to blame either the prince or Buckingham for their conduct, or for the narrative delivered to the parliament? This is a capital fact, and ought to be wall attended to. D'Ewes's speech is in Nalson, vol. ii. p. 368. No author or historian of that age mentions the discovery of Buckingham's impostures as a cause of disgust in the parliament. Whitlocke, p. 1. only fays, that the commons began to suspect, that it had been spleen in Buckingham, not zeal for public good, which had induced him to break the Spanish match: A clear proof that his falschood was not suspected. Wilson, p. 780. says, that Buckingham lost his popularity after Bristol arrived, not because that nobleman discovered to the world the falsehood of his narrative, but because he proved that Buckingham, while in Spain, had professed himself a papist; which is false, and which was never said by Bristol. In all the debates which which remain, not the least hint is ever given that any falsehood was suspected in the narrative. I shall farther add, that even if the parliament had discovered the deceit in Buckingham's narrative, this ought not to have altered their political measures, or made them refuse supply to the king. They had supposed it practicable to wrest the Palatinate by arms from the house of Austria; they had represented it as prudent to expend the blood and treasure of the nation in such an enterprise; they had believed that the king of Spain never had any fincere intention of restoring that principality. It is certain, that he had not now any such intention: And though there was reason to sufpect, that this alteration in his views had proceeded from the ill conduct of Buckingham, yet past errors could not be retrieved; and the nation was undoubtedly in the same Stuation which the parliament had ever supposed, when they so much harassed their sovereign, by their impatient, importunate, and even undutiful solicitations. To which we may add, that Charles himself was certainly deceived by Buckingham, when he corroborated his favourite's narrative by his testimony. Party historians are somewhat inconsistent in their representations of these transactions:, They represent the Spaniards as totally infincere, that theymay reproach James with credulity in being so long deceived by them: They represent them as sincere, that they may reproach the king, the prince, and the duke, with falsehood in their narrative to the parliament. The truth is, they were infincere at first; but the reasons, proceeding from bigotry, were not suspected by James, and were at last overcome. They became sincere; but the prince, deceived by the many unavoidable causes of delay, believed that they were still deceiving him.

NOTE [U], p. 253.

THIS petition is of so great importance, that we shall here give it at length. Humbly shew unto our sovereign lord the king, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament assembled, That, whereas it is declared and enacted by a statute made in the time of the reign of king Edward I. commonly called Statutum de tallagie lagio non concedendo, that no tallage or aid shall be levied ' by the king or his lieirs in this realm, without the goodwill and affent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other the freemen of the commonalty of this realm: And, by authority of parliament holden in the five and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it is declared and cnacted, That, from thenceforth, no person shall be compelled to make any loans to the king against his will, because such loans were against reason, and the franchise of the land: And, by other laws of this realm, it is provided, that none should be charged by any charge or imposition called a benevolence, or by fuch like charge: By which the statutes before mentioned, and other the good laws and statutes of this realm, your subjects have inherited this freedom, that they should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not fet by common confent in parliament.

II. Yet nevertheless, of late divers commissions directed to fundry commissioners in several counties, with instructions, have issued; by means whereof your people have been in divers places assembled, and required to lend certain sums of money unto your majesty, and many of them, upon their refusal so to do, have had an oath administered unto them not warrantable by the laws or statutes of this realm, and have been confirmed to become bound to make appearance and give attendance before your privycouncil, and in other places; and others of them have been therefore imprisoned, confined, and fundry other ways molested and disquieted: And divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people, in several counties, by ··lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, commissioners for musters, justices of peace, and others, by command or direction from your majesty, or your privy-council, against the laws and free customs of this realm.

III. And whereas also, by the statute called The great charter of the liberties of England, it is declared and enacted, That no freeman may be taken or imprisoned, or be disseised of his freehold or liberties, or his free customs, or be outlawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

IV. And, in the eight and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward-III. it was declared and enacted, by authority of parliament, That no man, of what estate or condition that he be, should be put out of his land or tenements, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disherited, nor put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law.

V. Nevertheless, against the tenor of the said statutes, and other the good laws and statutes of your realm to that end provided, divers of your subjects have of late been imprisoned without any cause shewed; and, when, for their deliverance, they were brought before justice, by your majesty's writs of Habeas Corpus, there to undergo, and receive as the court should order, and their keepers commanded to certify the causes of their detainer, no cause was certified, but that they were detained by your majesty's special command, signified by the lords of your privy-council, and yet were returned back to several prisons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make answer according to the law.

VI. And whereas of late great companies of soldiers and mariners have been dispersed into divers counties of the realm, and the inhabitants, against their wills, have been compelled to receive them into their houses, and there to suffer them to sojourn, against the laws and customs of this realm, and to the great grievance and vexation of the people.

VII. And whereas also, by authority of parliament, in the five and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, That no man shall be forejudged of life or limb against the form of the Great charter and law of the land: And, by the said Great charter, and other the laws and statutes of this your realm, no man ought to be judged to death but by the laws established in this your realm, either by the customs of the same realm, or by acts of parliament: And whereas no offender, of what kind soever, is exempted from the proceedings to be used, and punishments to be inslicted by the laws and statutes of this your realm: Nevertheless, of late divers commissions, under your majesty's great seal, have issued forth, by which certain persons have been assigned and appointed commissioners, with power and authority to pro-eced within the land, according to the justice of martial law, against such soldiers and mariners, or other dissolute persons joining with them, as should commit any murther, robbery, felony, mutiny, or other outrage or misdemeanour · whatsoever, and by such summary course and order as is agreeable to martial law, and as is used in armies in time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of such offenders, and them to cause to be executed and put to death according to the law martial.

VIII. By pretext whereof some of your majesty's subjects have been by some of the said commillioners put to death, when and where; if, by the laws and statutes of the land, they had deferved death, by the fame laws and statutes also they might, and by no other ought, to have been judged and executed.

IX. And also fundry grievous offenders, by colour thereof claiming an exemption, have escaped the punishments due to them by the laws and statutes of this your realm, by reason that divers of your officers and ministers of justice have unjustly refused or forborn to proceed against fuch offenders according to the same laws and flatnes, upon pretence that the faid offenders were punishable only by martial law, and by authority of fuch committions as, aforefaid: Which commissions, and all sther of like nature, are wholly and directly contrary to the faid laws and statutes of this your realm.

X. They do therefore humbly pray your most excellent majesty, That no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent, by act of parliament: And that note be called to make answer, or take such oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwise molested or · disquieted, concerning the same, or for results thereof: And that no freeman, in any fuch manner as is before mentioned, be imprisoned or detained: And that your majesty would be pleased to remove the said soldiers and mariners, and that people may not be so burthened in time to come; and that the aforesaid commissions, for proceeding by martial law, may be revoked and annulled: And that hereafter no commissions of like nature may issue forth, to any person or persons whatsoever, to be executed as aforefaid, lest, by colour of them, any of your majesty's subjects jects be destroyed, or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchise of the land.

XI. All which they most humbly pray of your most excellent majesty, as their rights and liberties, according to the laws and statutes of this realm: And that your majesty would also vouchsafe to declare, That the awards, doings, and proceedings to the prejudice of your people, in any of the premises, shall not be drawn hereaster into consequence or example: And that your majesty would be also graciously pleased, for the surther comfort and safety of your people, to declare your royal will and pleasure, that in the things aforesaid, all your officers and ministers shall serve you according to the laws and statutes of this realm, as they tender the honour of your majesty, and the prosperity of this kingdom. Stat. 17 Car. cap. 14.

NOTE [X], p. 267.

THE reason assigned by sir Philip Warwick, p. 2. for this unusual measure of the commons, is, that they intended to deprive the crown of the prerogative, which it had assumed, of varying the rates of the impositions, and at the same time were resolved to cut off the new rates fixed by James. These were considerable diminutions both of revenue and prerogative; and whether they would have there stopped, considering their present disposition, may be much doubted. The king, it seems, and the lords, were resolved not to trust them; nor to render a revenue once precarious, which perhaps they might never afterward, be able to get re-established on the old sooting.

NOTE [Y], p. 304.

cerning Impolitions, p. 131. "This power of laying ing on arbitrarily new impolitions being a prerogative in point of government, as well as in point of profit, it cannot be restrained or bound by act of parliament; it so cannot be limited by any certain or fixt rule of law, not " more than the course of a pilot upon the sea, who must turn the helm, or bear higher or lower fail, according to "the wind or weather; and therefore it may be properly I faid, that the king's prerogative in this point, is as strong " as Sumfon; it cannot be bound: For though an act of " parliament be made to restrain it, and the king doth " give his confent unto it, as Samfon was bound with his "own consent, yet if the Philistines come; that is, if any " just or important occasion do arise, it cannot hold or Frestrain the prerogative; it will be as throad, and broken " as easy as the bonds of Samfon—The king's prerogatives " are the fun-beams of the crown, and as inseparable from " it as the fun-beams from the fun: The king's crown " must be taken from him; Samson's hair must be cut out, " belofe his courage can be, any jot abated. Hence it is " that neither the king's act, nor any act of parliament, " can give away his prerogative."

NOTE [Z], p. 356.

WE shall, here make use of the liberty, allowed in a note, to expatiate a little on the present subject. It must be confessed that the king, in this declaration, touched upon that circumstance in the English constitution, which it is most dissicult, or rather altogether impossible, to regulate by laws, and which must be governed by certain delicate ideas of propriety and decency, rather than by any exact rule or prescription. To deny the parliament all right of remoustrating against what they esteem grievances, were to reduce that affembly to a total infignificancy, and to deprive the people of every advantage, which they could reap from popular councils. To complain of the parliament's employing the power of taxation, as the tacans of extorting concessions from their sovereign, were to expect, that they would entirely disarm themselves, and renounce the sole expedient, provided by the confitution, for ensuring to the kingdom a just and legal ad-In different periods of English story, there ministration. Vol. VI. occus Pp occur instances of their remonstrating with their princes in the freest manner, and sometimes of their refusing supply, when difguilted with any circumstance of public conduct. It is, however, certain, that this power, though effential to parliaments, may easily be abused, as well bythe frequency and minuteness of their remonstrances, as by their intrusion into every part of the king's counsels and determinations. Under colour of advice, they may give disgussed orders; and in complaining of grievances, they may draw to themselves every power of government. Whatever meafure is embraced, without confulting them, may be pronounced an oppression of the people; and, till corrected, they may refule the most necessary supplies to their indigent fovereign. From the very nature of this parliamentary liberty, it is evident, that it must be left unbounded by law: Fer who can foretel how frequently grievances may occur, or what part of admin.stration may be affected by them? From the nature too of the human . frame, it may be expected, that this liberty would be exerted in its full extent, and no branch of authority be allowed to remain unmolefled in the hands of the princes For will the weak limitations of respect and decorum he sufficient to restrain human ambition, which so frequently breaks through all the prescriptions of law and instice?

But here it is observable, that the wisdom of the English constitution, or rather the concurrence of accidents, has provided, in different periods, certain irregular checks to this privilege of parliament, and thereby maintained, in fome tolerable measure, the dignity and authority of the crown.

In the ancient constitution, before the beginning of the seventeenth century, the meetings of parliament were precatious, and were not frequent. The sessions were short; and the members had no leisure, either to get acquainted with each other, or with public business. The ignorance of the age made men more submissive to that authority which governed them. And above all, the large demesses of the crown, with the small expence of government during that period, rendered the prince almost independent, and taught the parliament to preserve great submission and duty towards him.

'Ing

In our present constitution, many accidents, which have rendered governments every where, as well as in Great Britain, much more burthensome than formerly, have thrown into the hands of the crown the disposal of a large revenue, and have enabled the king, by the private interest and ambition of the members, to restrain the public interest and ambition of the body. While the opposition (for we must shall have an opposition, open or disgussed) endeavours to draw every branch of administration under the consistant of parliament, the consisters reserve a past to the disposal of the crown; and he royal prerogative, though deprived of its sancier; powers, if an atoms a due weight in the falance of the conflittition.

It was the face of the house of Stuart to govern England at a period, when the former fornce of anthority was alreads much diminified, and hefore the latter began to ilow in any tolerance abhindance. Without a regular and fixed foundation, the throng perpetually tottered; and the prince fit upon it anxiously and precariously. Excist expedient iiled by James and Charles in order to support their dignity, we have feen attended with fensible inconveniencies. The majefly of the crown, derived from ancount powers and prerogatives, procured respect, and checked the approaches of infolent introders: But it begat in he king to high an idea of his own rank and fiation, as made him incapable of stooping to popular courses, or submitting in any degree to the control of parliament. The alliance with the hierarchy strengthened law by the sanction of religion: But it enraged the puritanical party, and exposed the prince to the attacks of enemies, numerous, victent, and implacable. The memory too of these two kings, from like caules, has been attended, in some degree, with the same infelicity, which purfued them during the whele course of their lives. Though it must be confessed, that their skill in government was not proportioned to the extreme delicacy of their fituation; a fufficient indulgence has not been given them, and all the blame, by several historians, has been unjustly thrown on their side. Their violations of law, particularly those of Charles, are, in some sew instances, transgressions of a plain limit, which was marked out to royal authority. But the encroachments of the commons, though in the beginning P p 2 good judges, and were equally capable of defiroring the just balance of the confliction. While they exercised the powers transmitted to them, in a manner more independent, and less compliant, than had ever before been practised; the kings were, perhaps improdently, but, as they imagined, from necessary, tempted to assume powers, which adifferent manner by the crown. And from the shock of these opposite pretentions, together with religious controversy, arose as the factions, convulsions, and disorders, which attended that period.

This Note was, in the first edition, a part of the text.

NOTE [AA], p. 415.

MR. Carte, in his life of the duke of Ormond, have given us some evidence to prove, that this letter was entirely a forgery of the popular leaders, in order to induce the king to lacrifice Strafford. He tells us, that Strafford laid to to his ton, the night before his execution. Hat there are some reasons, why I adhere to the common way of telling this flory. 1. The account of the forgery comes through several hands, and from men of characters not fully known to the public. A circumstance which weakens every evidence. It is a heariar of a hearlay. 2. It feems: impossible, but saming lord Strafford must inform the king, who would not have failed to trace the forgery, and sixpose his encinics to their merited infamy. 3. It is not to be conceived but Chirendon and Whitlocke, not to mention others, must have heard of the matter. 4. Sir George Ratchille, in his life of Strafford, tells the story the fame way that Clarendon and Whitlocke do. Would he alfo, who was Stialford's intimate friend, never have heard of the lorgery? It is remarkable, that this life is dedicated or addressed to young Strassord. Would not be have put fir George right in formaterial and interesting a fact?

NOTE [BB], p. 416.

IIAT made this bill appear of lefs confequence was, that the parliament voted tonnage and poundage for no longer a period than two months: and as that branch was more than half of the revenue, and the government could not possibly lubfifl without it; it feemed in hirectly in the power of the parliament to continue thendelyes as long as they pleafed. This indeed was true if the ordinary adminishration of government: But on the approaches lowards a civil war, which was not then forefeen, it had been of great confequence to the long to have referred the right of dislolution, and to have reduced any extremity, sather than allow the continuance of the pallament.

NOTE [CC], p. 447;

T is now to mixerfally allowed, notwithflanding forme muttering to the contrary, that the king had no hand in the hillirebellion, that it will be superthous to insist on a point which feems fo clear. I shall only suggest a very few arguments, among an infinite number which occur. (1) Ought the allieuration of perfulious, infamous Franchis ever to have passed for any amhority? (2) Nobody can tell us what the words of the pretended commission week. That commission which we find in Rushworth, vol. v. p. 450. and in Milton's Works, Toland's edition, is plainly an impolline; becaule it pretends to be date in Obiober 1641, yet mentions fasts which happened not till fome months after. It appears that the Infli releas, observing some incontistence in their first forgery, were obliged to forge this commillion anew, yet could not render it coherent or probable. (3) Nothing could be more obviously pernicious to the king's cause than the Irish rebellion; because it increased his necessities, and rendered him thill more dependent on the parliament, who had beforc P p 3 fore-fassiciently shewn on what terms they would assist hin. (4) The inflant the long heard of the rebellion, which was a very few days after its commencement, he wrote to the parliament, and gave over to them the management of the war. Had he built any projects on that rebellion, would be not have waited foine little time to ighow they would incceed? Would be prefently have adopted a measure which was evidently so huriful to his authority? (5) What can be imagined to be the lang's projects? To rade the high to arms, I suppose, and bring them over to England for his affiliance. But is it not plain, that the king never intended to the war in England? Had that been l's intention, we he have rendered the parliament perpetual? Doe it not appear, role train c events, that the parliame of forced him into the war? (6) The king conveyed to the juffices intelligence cylich ought to have prevented the rebellion. (7) The Iruh catholics, in all their future transactions with the king, where they enleavour to excuse their insurestion, never had the affirance to plead his commission. Even among themselves they dropped that project. It appears that he Phelim O'Neale, chiefly, and he only at full, promoted that imposture. See Carte's Ormond, vol. in. No. 105. 171, 112. 114, 115. 121. 132. 137. (8) O'Neale himfelf confessed the impossure on his trial and at his excetttion. See Nalson, vol. vi. p. 528. Magnire, at his execution, made a like confession. (9) It is ridiculous to mention the juffification which Charles II. gave to the marquis of Antrim, as il he had acted by his father's commission. Antiini had no in the first rebellion and where massacre. He joined not the rebels till two years after: It was with the king's consent, and he did important strvice, in fending over a body of men to Montrole.

*582

NOTE [DD], p. 486.

THE great courage and conduct displayed by many of the popular leaders, have commonly inclined men to do them in one respect, more honour than they deserve, and to suppose, that, like able politicians, they employed? pretences which they fecretly despised, in order to ferve . their selfish purposes. It is however probable, if not certain, that they were, generally speaking, the dupes of their own zeal. Hypocrny, quite pure and free from fanaticism, is perhaps, except among men fixed in a determined phi-Tofophical feeptieren, then unknown, as rare as fanaticifm entirely purged from all mixture of hypocrify. So congenial to the human mind are religious fentiments, that it is impossible to counterfeit long these holy fervours, without seeling some share of the assumed warroth: And on the other hand, so presquious and temporary, from the frailty of human nature, is the operation of these spiritual views, that the religious cestasics, if constantly employed, must often be counterfeit, and must be warped by those mos familiar motives of interest and ambition, which in-Tenfibly gain upon the mind. This indeed feems the key to most of the celebrated characters of that age. Equally of fraud and of ardour, these pions patriots calked perpenally of feeking the Lord, yet still pursued their own purpoles; and have left a memorable leffon to posterity, how delutive, bow destructive, that principle is by which They were animated.

With regard to the people, we can entertain no doubt that the controversy was, on their part, entirely theolo-The generality of the nation could never have flown out into fuch fury in order to obtain new privileges and acquire greater liberty than they and their ancellors had ever been acquainted with. Their fathers had been entirely fatisfied with the government of Elizabeth: Why mould they have been thrown into such extreme rage gainst Charles, who, from the beginning of his reign, , wished only to maintain such a government? And why not, at least, compound matters with him, when by all his laws, it appeared that he had agreed to depart from it? Especially, as he had put it entirely out of his power to retract that resolution. It is in vain, therefore, to dignify this civil war and the parliamentary authors of it, by suppoling it to have any other confiderable foundation than theological zeal, that great and noted source of animosity among men. The royalists also were very commonly zealots; but as they were at the same time maintaining the the established constitution, in slate as well as church, they had an object which was natural, and which might produce the greatest passion, even without any considerable mixture of theological servour.—The former part of this note was, in the surfic editions, a part of the text.

NOTE [EE], p. 488.

I N fome of these declarations, supposed to be period by lord Falkland, is found the found to lord Falkland, is found the first regular definition of the constitution, according to our present ideas of if, that occurs in any English composition; at least any published by authority. The three species of government, mountchical, arifformical, and democratical, are there plainly diffinguished, and the English government is expressly said to be none of them pure, but all of them mixed and come pered together. This thile, though the fende of it was implied in many institutions, no former Ling of England would have used, and no subject would have been permitted to use. Banks and the crown-lawyers against Hambden, in the case of ship-mency, infill plainly and openly on the king's absolute and fovereign power: And the opposite lawvers do not denv it: They only affert, that the subjects have also a fundamental property in their goods, and that no part of them can be taken but by their own consent in parliament. But that the parliament was instituted to check and control the king, and share the supreme power, would, in all former times, have heef! esteemed very blunt and indiscreet, if not illegal, language We need not be surprised that governments should long. continue, though the boundaries of anthority, in their feveral branches, be implicit, confused and undetermined. This is the case all over the world. Who can draw an exact line between the spiritual and temporal powers in catholic states? What code ascertained the precise autobarity of the Roman senate, in every occurrence? Perhaps the English is the first mixed government, where the anthority of every part has been very accurately defined: Andryet there still remain many very important questions between tl.C.

the two honses, that, by common consent, are buried in a discreet silence. The king's power is indeed more exactly limited; but this period, of which we now treat, is the time at which that accuracy commenced. And it appears from Warwick and Hobbes, that many royalists blamed his philosophical precision in the king's penman, and hought that the veil was very imprudently drawn off the mysteries of government. It is certain that liberty reaped mighty advantages from these controversies and inquiries; and the royal authority itself became more secure, within those provinces which were assigned to it. Since the first publication of this believe, the sequel of total Clarendon has been published; where that nobleman asserts, that he himself author these remonstrances and memorials of the kin

NOTE [FI], p. 511.

THITLOCKE, who was one of the commissioners, lays, p. 65. In this treaty the king manifested has great parts and abilities, strength of reason and quick-ness of apprehension, with much patience in hearing what was objected against him; wherein he allowed all " freedom, and would himself sum up the arguments, and give a most clear judgment upon them. His unhap-" pruess was, that he had a better opinion of others judgments than of his own, though they were weaker than his own; and of this the parliament commissioners had experience to their great trouble. They were often waiting on the king, and debating some points of the treaty with him, until midnight, before they could come " to a conclusion. Upon one of the most material points, "they pressed his majesty with their reasons and best arguments they could use to grant what they desired. king faid, he was fully fatisfied, and promifed to give them his answer in writing according to their de-sire; but because it was then past midnight, and too " late to put it into writing, he would have it drawn up " next morning (when he commanded them to wait on " him him again); and then he would give them his answer in writing, as it was now agreed upon. But next morning the king told them, that he had altered his mind:

535

And some of his friends, of whom the commissions, inquired, told them, that after they were gone, and even his council retired, some of his bod-chamber never let pressing and persuading him till they prevailed on him to change his source resolutions. It is difficult, however, to conceive, that any negonation could have succeeded between the king and parliament while the latter infified, as they did all along, on a total submission to all their demands; and challenged the whole power, which they professely intended to employ, to the punishment of the king's friends.

NOTE [GG], r. 521.

 $\eta_{\rm es}$

THE author is schible that some blame may be thrown ... inpon him, on account of this last clause, in Mr. Hambden's character: as if he were willing to entertains a fidpicion of bad intentions, where the actions were praise worthy. But the author's meaning is directly contrary? He esteems the last actions of Mr. Hambden's live to have been very blamesble; though, as they were derived from good motives, only pulled to an extreme, there is room left to believe, that the intentions of that patriot, as well as of many of his party, were laudable. Had the preceding administration of the king, which we are apt to call aibi trary, proceeded from ambition, and an unjust defire of en croaching on the ancient liberties of the people, there would have been less reason for giving him any trult, or leaving in his hands a confiderable share of that power which he had so much abused. But if his conduct was derived in a great measure from necessity, and from a natural delire of defending that prerogative which was transmitted to the from his ancestors, and which his parliaments were visibly encroaching on; there is no reason why he may not be esteemed a very virtuous prince, and entirely worthy of trust from his people. The attempt, therefore, of totally annihilating annihilating monarchical power, was a very blameable extreme; especially as it was attended with the danger, to *Ay the least, of a civil war, which besides the numberless ilis inseparable from it, exposed liberty to much greater perils than it could have incurred under the now limited authority of the king. But as these points could not be supposed so clear during the time, as they are, or may be at present; there are great reasons of alleviation for men who were heated by the controverly, or engaged in the action. And it is remarkable, that even at present souch is the force of party prejudices) there are few people who have coolness enough to see these matters in a proper light, or are convinced that the parliament could prudently have stopped in their pretensions. They still plead the violations of liberty attempted by the king, after granting the petinion of right; without confidering the extreme harth treatment which he met with, after making that great conand the impossibility of supporting government by the fevenue then fettled on the crown. The worst of it is, that there was a great tang of enthusiasm in the conduct, of the parliamentary leaders, which, though it might render their conduct sincere, will not much enhance their elaracter with posterity. And though Hambden was, rliaps, less insected with this spirit than many of his as-sociates, he appears not to have been altogether free from it. His intended migration to America, where he could only propose the advantage of enjoying puritancial prayers and fermons, will be allowed a proof of the prevalence of bis spirit in him.

NOTE [HM], p. 538.

Na letter of the king to the queen, preserved in the prinsh Museum, and published by Mrs. Macaulay, vol. p. 420. he says, that unless religion was preserved, the militia (being not as in France a formed powerful strength) would be of little use to the crown; and that if the pulpits had not obedience, which would never be, if presbyterian overnment was absolutely established, the king would have shave but small comfatt of the militia. This reasoning shows the king's good sense, and proves that his attachment to episcopacy, though partly sounded on religious principles, was also, in his situation, derived from the soundest views of civil policy. In reality, it was easy for the king to perceive, by the necessary connexion between trisles and important matters, and by the connexion maintained at that time between religion and politics, that when he was confending for the surplice, he was in essect sighting for his crown, and even for his head. Few of the popular party could perceive this connexion: Most, of them were carried headlong by fanaticism; as might be expected in the ignorant multitude. Few even of the leaders seem to have had more enlarged views.

BND OF THE SIXTH VOIUME.